JOHN L. ON SHAKESPEARE.

At One Time He Was All Right, but Now He Ain't In It. See?

"Not long ago," said a congressman to A. H. Lewis (Dan Quin), the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Times, "I met John L. Sullivan, the ex-fighter. It was over in Boston. I had gone into a hostelry kept by one Paddy Reardon, I believe, who is also more or less famous as a sporting character. I looked at the big ex-champion with some interest. He was eating a lunch. There was enough of it for two men. About him hovered a buzzing swarm of admirers.

"Most of them were theatrical people. They were talking stage, of course. Very choppy people, these actors. Sullivan was listening with a sort of condescension which was delightful. It was clear to any onlooker that the big pugilist regarded himself as quite as much of a histrion as any, and when he vouchsafed his views no kind of doubt remained.

"'Oh, I'll tell you ducks about Shakespeare,' he finally said as he sopped one tremendous hand in the finger bowl as if it had been a wash basin. 'Shakespeare was all right. That mug was all right in his day. Understand? But that was long ago. He's a has been. That's what Shakespeare is, and he'd know it if he was here himself. And he'd tell you blokes so—that's what Shakespeare would.

"'Now, I know something about this myself. See? I'm on the stage, and I'm taking in the boodle, too, you can bet your life. Now, I tell you mugs the people don't want these Shakespearin plays. They've got beyond it—that's what they have. We ain't got no Shakespearin actors now anyhow. That fellow Barrett was the best of 'em. That mug was Shakespearin. And he was on the level—that's what Barrett was. But he's dead. He ain't in it no longer. And now who can do Shakespeare? There's two or three trying it, but they're a lot of muckers—a lot of first class guys. Those mugs make me sick. Understand? They make me tired—on the dead they do.'"

As to His Appearance.

"Can you describe the man you saw hanging about the house the day before the robbery?" inquired the detective.

The Perkins Junction storekeeper, whose place of business had been broken into and robbed of a considerable quantity of plug tobacco, canned tomatoes and dried peaches, together with the entire contents of the cash drawer, amounting to $1.56, reflected a moment and then asked:

"Do you know Bill Quinn?"

"I don't think I do."

"Lives down in the Wallick neighborhood."

"I don't know him."

The merchant shifted his quid to the other cheek, chewed thoughtfully awhile and said:

"Know Si Roberts?"

"No."

"Auctioneer. Hangs round Thompson's a good deal."

"Never heard of him. But as to this man you saw loafing about here before the robbery took place, I would like to have you describe him as well as you can."

Again the storekeeper reflected.

"Well," he said at last, "he looks some like Bill Quinn and some like Si Roberts."—Chicago Tribune.

True Love on Guard.

Among the callers at Auburn jail is a very elderly woman, who brings dainties to a man.

"What is he?" asked the turnkey; "your husband?"

"Oh, dear me, no!" said she coyly. "I guess he isn't my husband."

"Your brother?"

"Brother! Why, the idea!" said she. "No, he is not."

"Your son?" suggested the turnkey.

"Sir-r-r!" said she.

"Your father?"

"No, sir, he ain't my father, though that wouldn't be so bad. He is just—well—ahem!" said she, "he—well—he is my intended!"

"Your intended!"

"Yes," said she, "he intended to be mine before he went and did this job that pulled him in, and, young man, I myself intend that he shall marry me when he comes out, and I never spoil a good intention. You give him them sassengers and tell him that his true love waits for him at the portle."

The face at the inside of the portal five minutes later looked happy—happy that there was a door "betwixt them."—Lewiston Journal.

Sock and Buskin.

The expression "sock and buskin," which literally means comedy and tragedy, found its origin in the "soccus," the Latin name of the low shoe worn by the ancient comic actors, and the buskin, a contraction of the French word "brossequin," remotely derived from the Greek "bursa," a hide or high soled shoe worn by the ancient tragedians to increase their height. The soccus reached to the ankle only, whereas the buskin extended to the knee.—Stageland.

A Mountain Dream.

By JOSEPHINE A. BOWEN.

"Do you go out alone as often as you wish?"

"Yes; only when they have men at the house and want me to help."

"Very well, then. Come every day, if you can, and I will see if there is not some way that I can help you."

She laid her little hand on the head of her dog and they went away, the noble creature trotting by her side with a wise and protecting air that was almost human—or, shall we not rather say, if we reflect a little, superhuman?

CHAPTER II.

"Well, she came, of course"——

Yes, I found myself unable to go on with my landscapes from the moment that she left. I called myself an idiot and tried to shake myself into reason and common sense, but it was of no use. That sweet, pathetic little face haunted me, and I was in a fever of impatience to see her again. Well, about noon of the next day she came, as before, with her dog by her side. It was more like a dream than reality, she was so little like other girls.

"I am glad that you have come," I said quietly, "and I am going to ask you to unbraid your hair and let it fall over your shoulders; will you?" Without reply she untied the ribbon, slowly unbraided and shook loose her wonderful hair. It fell around her like a shadowy mist, and so etherealized her that I began to doubt whether she were indeed a mere human child or I the victim of a mental hallucination. I began to outline my picture, but decided, as much as I love a good dog, to leave hers out and make an after study of him to please his little mistress; for I wanted that face, with its pensive lips and wonderful veil of hair, to be what it has since become—a mountain dream. She came, day after day, always gliding in and loosening her hair without further request from me; and she glided as silently into my heart. In ten days' time I knew that I loved her better than my own life; that I would protect and defend her with my last drop of blood.

We had talked but little all this time. I had asked her if she was missed at home, and she said that her father was away and that Mannella had some Mexicans visiting her; "and I think they are glad to have me away," she said, "but they quarrel terribly, and although I can't understand all they say I think they are talking about me."

Here was danger. What step should I take? Should I ask this child to fly with me? Never! Better death for both of us than dishonor for her. The censorious world would never have believed that I would have died to keep my Dream, as I called her in all my thoughts, pure and innocent, until the time came when she could "lay her sweet hands in mine and trust to me." Should I go to this nest of Mexican cutthroats and boldly declare myself her lover, claiming the right to protect her, and trust to fate? Most likely the result of such a step would be death for me and worse than death for her. No, I must take care of myself for her sake. To go to her father was impossible. He was a fugitive from justice—perhaps swinging from some impromptu gallows in gorge or canyon. I had no friends in all the great northwest to aid me. I must act alone—but how?

The picture was nearly finished. You have seen it, Jim—the sweet pathos of the face, the mystic eyes, the cloud of shadowy hair, the form half veiled in mist, the background a faint vision of the mountains. I was satisfied. It must have been an inspiration; it was the inspiration of love—for to save my immortal soul I could no more paint such a picture now than I could bring the dead to life. She looked upon it as a miracle, and upon me as the followers of Christ may have looked upon him.

All this time no word of love had passed my lips. I must see my way clearly before I spoke, and I waited and pondered. Did it never occur to me that she might be followed and watched? Yes, I had thought of that, but this cabin, as you may have observed, commands a view of miles. I had watched her going and coming after the first few days. I could see the little figure far away as it advanced in coming or faded in the distance when she departed, and always she seemed unmolested—and with her faithful guardian by her side I trusted that she was safe.

That smoke gets into my eyes, Jim. What do you say? Tears! Well, I am not ashamed of them. Perhaps you would not have fallen in love with an outlaw's daughter, but I did. I loved her so that no other woman will ever have any charm for me. However, I determined to say no word of my feelings toward her until I could by some means place her in safety.

It was while my mind was in this state of love and anxiety that I finished her picture. She looks at you from the canvas just as she looked at me—mournful and tender as a wounded dove.

As an excuse for further visits I told her that I must now paint a portrait of Knight, and she gladly assented. I prepared my canvas and waited impatiently for her next visit.

It was autumn by this time—autumn gloriously beautiful, as it can only be in these mountains. Not with the splendor of variegated forests, although they are very beautiful, too. I sometimes shut my eyes and my imagination pictures our old home in Illinois, especially as it used to look in the fall of the year. The low hills which surrounded our valley farm were covered with oak, maple, hickory, cherry, hackberry and many other trees, and at that time of the year they were russet and crimson and gold with the first kisses of decay.

Wild grapevines swung from branch to branch filled with small purple clusters, acid, to be sure, but nectar to a boy's taste. Black and red were hung in tempting profusion. Nuts lay thick in the fallen leaves or came rattling down through the hazy air. The sumach, most gorgeous of American plants, blazed in glory and offered its spikes of velvet berries. Crows called from the treetops. Bluejays added a bit of pure azure to the mosaic of color. Blackbirds rose in clouds from the cornfields and squirrels chattered over their abundant stores. Along the roadside, in the fence corners, bittersweet hung its coral berries among great purple and white wild asters and the large, pale pink blooms of horsemint. A little river bordered the farm on one side, and we could hear its waters plunging over a milldam just out of sight.

You know how short lived this beautiful time is in that latitude. But while Nature was calling me in her most alluring voice to come out and be happy I husked corn from early morning till night. Then, after the horses were cared for and the milking done, I crawled into my small, low chamber under the roof, too tired even to rest and sleep.

CHAPTER III.

Crying to God for vengeance.

But let us come back to the mountains. Here we had none of this, but instead the indescribable colors of the great range, the golden splendor of the sun shining through an atmosphere like amber wine. I breathed balsamic odors. I walked over fragrant beds of pine needles, and searched for the latest Rocky mountain wild flowers—unequaled in all the northern world—and I dreamed of my love. No matter what her father might be, I remembered that her mother had taught her to pray, and believe me, Jim, it is the mother who makes us what we are.

My own mother, who died when I was a child, was a passionate lover of beauty. I have seen her kiss the early flowers that I used to bring her; I have seen her tender blue eyes watch the sunset with a look of longing in them as if she were tired of her hard life and would be glad to go where there was rest. Had she been alive I would have asked her to come, and I would have placed my love in her motherly arms and felt that she was safe. But I had no one.

While sitting in my cabin waiting for her I was startled by a rapid step, a rush of the dog and in she came, panting and white as death.

"What is it, Carol? What is it, child?" I cried, springing toward her.

"Oh, she frightened me so—Mannella! She found it out that I came here, and she and Jose were talking last night and they said that I must be put out of the way! Oh, Mr. Von Ranke! where is it they would put me?"

"They shall not harm you," I said, as calmly as I could, for I wished to quiet her. I did not take her in my arms, as I wish that I had, but we men are not so bad as the erotic school of novelists paint us—at least some of us are not. I know that to me she standing there in her helpless, unprotected innocence seemed so sacred that I felt it would be profanation to lay my hands upon her, even in the tenderest love.

(TO BE CONTINUED).

Wished They Were All Blind.

Robert Burns' friend, Dr. Blacklock, the blind poet, was a licentiate of the Church of Scotland and used to preach occasionally.

One Sunday he was supplying a country pulpit. Certain deaf old women, as was the custom in those days, had squatted on the pulpit stairs to be as near the preacher as possible. Like the mass of the Scottish people, they abominated sermons that were read.

One of them, as soon as the discourse was begun, said to her neighbor in a tone that was audible through the whole church, "Is he readin?"

"Tuts, woman! No, he canna read—he's blind."

"Blind, is he, eh? That's raal fort'nate. I wish they were a' blind!"—Youth's Companion.

Saving the Eyes.

The Eclectic Medical Journal says that in the continued use of the eyes in such work as sewing, typesetting, bookkeeping, reading and studying, the saving point is looking up from the work at short intervals and looking around the room. This may be practiced every 10 or 15 minutes. This relieves the muscular tension, rests the eyes and makes the blood supply much better.

Not Possible.

Mrs. Watts—I saw in the paper the other day that it is impossible for a man to kick with full force when there is nothing to kick at.

The Lorgnette Girl.

What shall be done with this quintessence of graceful impertinence? She is usually not one bit nearsighted. The dainty tortoise shell toy she so deftly and effectively wields is either an instrument of coquetry, defense or cruelty.

Viewed as the former weapon, it is without equal in the entire arsenal of flirtation's weapons. A skilled coquette can do more damage with it than with the fan. As a means of defense against the impertinences of other women it is invaluable. A cold stare, a contemptuous scrutiny through it will put to rout an army of impudent women.

But as an instrument of cruelty, an inquisitorial weapon, it does greatest execution. The lorgnette girl can display the most finished insolence with her fragile plaything. She is quite capable of calling the attention of the public to the worn gown or mended gloves of her victim.

A favorite and systematic course of cruelty is to take her station at the door of a summer resort hotel at the hour when the omnibus is arriving from the station with its load of weary, travel stained passengers and coldly scrutinize the dress of each woman as she alights. The lorgnette girl can be fascinating, she can be clever, but she has possibilities of brutality which would make a strong man quail.—Once a Week.

Future Postage.

"We have gone on selecting cotton wool till we have got some lighter than air. You've no idea what a useful material it is. We call it 'imponderal.'"

"What do you use it for?"

"Well, chiefly for packing articles to go by parcel post. It makes them weigh less than nothing, you know."

"And how do the postoffice people know what you have to pay?"

"That's the beauty of the new system," Mein Herr cried exultingly. "They pay us! We don't pay them. I've often got as much as 5 shillings for sending a parcel."

"But doesn't your government object?"

"Well, they do object a little. They say it comes so expensive in the long run. But the thing's as clear as daylight, by their own rules. If I send a parcel that weighs a pound more than nothing, pay threepence. So, of course, if it weighs a pound less than nothing I ought to receive threepence."—From "Sylvie and Bruno," Lewis Carroll.

All for Good Luck.

If your sweetheart is giving you a ring for good luck, and you are to have the choice, let it be an oval moonstone surrounded with small, clear diamonds. This stone, more than any other, has the reputation of bringing happiness, and even if you do not consider this the ring itself will be found a most effective one, the diamonds bringing out the many colors in the moonstone and the moonstone returning the compliment by intensifying the brilliancy of the diamonds.—Ladies' Home Journal.

A Cheap Disinfectant.

A disinfectant that costs very little and is perfectly odorless is made by dissolving a heaped teaspoonful of nitrare of lead in a quart of boiling water, stirring it with a stick and then adding it to a pailful of cold water. This is odorless and will not stain. It costs about three cents, and if it is thrown once a week down the bathtub, closet and stationary washbowl it will be money well spent.

UNNECESSARY RISKS.

The wise man runs no unnecessary risks. There are few greater risks than allowing a cold to fasten itself upon the system. Whether it attacks the throat, the lungs, the stomach or the muscular system, if given even a little time, it is sure to strengthen its hold and can then be shaken off only with great difficulty.

It is entirely unnecessary to run these risks. ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS applied to the back, chest, pit of the stomach or to the limbs will effectually prevent the trouble from increasing. They are simple in their ingredients, perfectly safe, and can be applied by a child.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS tone up the system.

AN UNSEEN ENEMY

Is more to be dreaded than an open and visible one. That subtile and lurking foe, which under the generic name of malaria manifests itself, when it clutches us in its tenacious grasp, in the various forms of chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague or ague cake, can only be effectually guarded against by fortifying the system against its insidious attacks with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a thorough antidote to the poison of miasma in the system, and a safeguard against it thoroughly to be relied upon. In the event of a malarious attack, avoid poisoning your system with quinine, and use instead this wholesome remedy, unobjectionable in taste and far more efficacious than any drug. Use the Bitters for dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation, kidney complaints and rheumatism.

Every man has his opinions, but in many instances he picked them up where somebody else dropped them.

CLIP SAVE AND SEND TO US

Because of the high speed at which Circular Saws are run more power is wasted in friction than is used in sawing, where the bearings of the shaky, wooden saw frame get out of line. In the Aermotor Saw Frame, the only Steel Saw Frame ever made, this difficulty is absolutely and wholly prevented because THE BEARINGS FOR THE SHAFT ARE MADE BY BABBITTING IT IN THE ENDS OF A PIECE OF STEEL TUBING. The steel tubing and babbitt are then slitted so as to take up wear with a bolt. The frame is all steel, very rigid, and riveted together so that nothing can get loose or out of place. The guard so encircles the saw as to make it impossible for any one to get hurt, a point of the greatest importance in a saw to be used by unskilled hands.

The swing frame which carries the wood to be sawed and which automatically returns to its place has also a guard to keep a pole off from the fly wheel and yet does not cause it to present very much of an angle to the saw. The use of a 100 lb. 20 inch fly wheel and 26 inch saw makes this easily possible. It is therefore, a very desirable Pole Saw, making it easy to cut up any long material quickly and safely. Another feature of

Since we offer this very superior saw frame with a 26 inch superior saw at a much less price than any cheap, imperfect wooden frame can be bought for, we are sure that the friends of the Aermotor will appreciate the fact that we have again been doing the public a great service and have distinguished ourselves in redesigning an old article and putting it into an infinitely improved shape.

For a saw of similar size and quality, and ordinary wooden frame, you would be charged $40. We make this allsteel frame and this superior saw at $30 AND GIVE YOU A CHANCE TO GET IT AT $15, for the benefit of our Geared Aermotor. We have sold an enormous number of Power Aermotor outfits with which saws are used, and a poor saw that runs hard detracts from their usefulness and their reputation. If we furnish a very superior saw at a very low price, many geared outfits will be bought to free them. Wherever one geared Aermotor goes, others are sure to follow.

When we take a well known article, redesign it, and put it in a shape very superior to anything that has appeared before, it widens and enlarges our reputation for doing well everything to which we put our hands, and this is the thing that has in the past brought so much business to our factory, and which in the future, we have no doubt, will bring, practically, all the business in our line. It is this reputation that we are daily working for.

We believe that this Aermotor Steel Saw Frame and Saw will confirm and enhance the fame which we have gained in the manufacture of Steel Windmills and Steel Towers, hence, for the purpose of scattering them so that everybody may know that a good thing can be had for a small price, WE OFFER THIS STEEL SAW AND FRAME FOR $15 CASH AND FIVE COPIES OF ADVERTISEMENT No. 2 of this series as per conditions stated in No 2. In our next advertisement No. 4, we shall talk of galvanizing, and make an offer that will be of universal interest. This is ads. No. 3. AERMOTOR CO.

Rapid Mending.

I wonder how many women know of the value of rubber tissue for mending. To a busy housewife whose time seems more than full it is invaluable. It is to be had at the rubber stores, and is usually sold by the ounce. It is just what its name would indicate, a very thin piece of transparent rubber. It is sold at fifteen cents an ounce, which means a piece perhaps six or eight inches wide and twenty inches long. That, I think, is a small estimate for an ounce. The tissue will not cover up holes—that is, not satisfactorily—but it will strengthen thin or weak places, mend tears or cuts, in fact, repair any goods that has not actually lost a piece of itself, and it is very nice for hemming.

We will suppose there is a three-cornered tear in a garment: First, cut away the frayed threads, draw the edges together either with invisible stitches on the wrong side, for threads put in cannot be pulled out afterward, or by holding it with the fingers. Place a piece of the tissue, the right size, over the tear and a piece of cambric or any other fabric desired over that, and press with a warm iron—quite warm, but not hot. Press firmly and then remove the iron and the mending is done. There must always be a surface between the rubber and the iron or the former will melt and stick to the iron.

For hemming, if the material is a goods that will not ravel, turn it up once, slip a strip of the tissue just under the edge and press. If the goods must be turned twice, baste the narrow turn with long stitches on what will be the inner side, then turn again, slip in the tissue as before and press it. This of course does not apply to wash goods, unless you wish to renew the patch. It is very useful in mending umbrellas; in repairing sleeves that are almost worn through; in strengthening broken places in made over goods, and in applying patches to the seat of the small boy's pants.—J. D. Cowles in Springfield Homestead.

Britain's Female Doctor of Music.

Dr. Annie Wilson Patterson, who has come rather prominently before the Dublin public lately as a musical composer and conductor, is the only female doctor of music in the kingdom, with the exception of her royal highness the Princess of Wales. Dr. Patterson was born at Largan, county Armagh, of Huguenot ancestry, and, having at an early age shown exceptional talent, was educated for an artistic career, first at the Alexandria school and second at the Alexandria college, Dublin. She studied Greek, Latin, French, Italian and Celtic before the age of fifteen, and, having decided upon music as her profession, entered the Royal Irish Academy of Music, where she was taught by Sir Robert Stewart and Dr. Joze, and subsequently became conductor and musical director of the Dublin Choral union, with which an orchestra is now associated.

Dr. Patterson's list of successes is a brilliant one, and includes a full certificate from South Kensington for freehand and model drawing; three exhibitions of twenty pounds, thirty pounds and fifty pounds respectively, and silver medal for natural science, gained at the Irish intermediate examinations from 1879 to 1881. Dr. Patterson was graduated as Mus. Bac. and B. A. (modern literature) at the Royal Irish university in 1887, and obtained a scholarship and gold medal for organ playing at the Royal Irish Academy of Music in 1888, and was graduated as Mus. Doc. in 1889. Dr. Patterson has written poems, essays and a cantata dedicated by special permission to the Princess of Wales.—London Letter.

The Beauties of a Good Memory.

A woman to be clever at conversation must have a good memory. She must keep in mind so much as she knows of the taste and prejudices of those present. If So-and-so's brother fought on the Confederate side, if such a one has Scotch ancestry, if such another had a dear friend or an aunt or something who went on the stage, if such another has written a poem on "Mortality," and has opinions about immortality, and so on of each and all she must remember. And "as you said the other day," is a good way to introduce a pungent remark; or, "as your favorite author has it," which shows a flattering regard for one's preferences. All these tricks, if you call them so, must be studied.

Don't try to make a man think how clever you are. Make him think how clever he is. Brighten him up. Lead him on to say witty things. You may even coax him up to a joke, be he as glum as Pharaoh's ghost. Remind him of clever things he said "the other day." Never mind if they are inventions of your own. Never mind if he knows they are; so long as he does not imagine that you know they are you are all right. Tell bright things about him. It won't take long to make him feel, especially if he is really a dull fellow, that he is a lot smarter than even he thought himself, and he will correspondingly adore you. A man is apt to frizzle under the fire of your own humor and wit and brightness, and of course a man is never comfortable when he frizzles.—Exchange.

The Begum of Bhopal.

Her highness Shah Jehan Begum is the daughter of the late Sikandar Begum, the last ruler of Bhopal, a remarkable woman in every sense of the word. She reigned during the mutiny, and gave valuable help to the British government, especially in assisting Sir Henry Durand and his party of fugitives in escaping from the Indore residency. She was also a fierce, strong and relentless woman, and kept her daughter, the present begum, in a state of abject submission. Once, when her daughter met at the house of a relative a young man of the royal house of Delhi, who was a suitor for her hand, she imprisoned her for months in her own room and beat her with her own hand, while the unfortunate lover was confined in an iron cage hung at the gate of the fort, and was only released after some months on the persistent remonstrances of the British political officials.

The present begum is now over fifty years of age, very small in person, not taller than an ordinary child ten years of age; but she has inherited many of the qualities and much of the ability, as well as the strong will, of her mother, and her attempts at ruling her daughter with the severity with which she was ruled has created a breach between them, which has been widened by interested mischief makers. Her subjects are Hindoo, but her highness is a Mohammedan, as are also most of the officials.—J. J. Pool.

Paper Making at the World's Fair.

The proposed exhibit by the paper makers at the World's Columbian exposition will mark a wonderful advancement in this branch of manufacturing, which is now fifth in the list of American industries, having risen from the tenth place since 1880. It is important not only in its magnitude, but, to quote the motto of a leading paper trade journal, "The consumption of paper is the measure of a people's culture."—Engineering Magazine.

MAIMED FOR COIN.

Schemes for Swindling Accident Insurance Companies.

LOSING A HAND A COMMON TRICK.

Permanent Physical Injuries Submitted to for the Purpose of Collecting on Policies.

The popularity of accident insurance companies has increased tenfold the opportunities for presenting and pressing fraudulent claims. To simulate death in order to obtain payment under a policy of life insurance requires much more scheming and also the co-operation of more than one confederate; but to a man who regards money as of greater worth than a limb, an accident insurance policy offers golden opportunities for fraud. Perhaps the most astounding instance of nerve on the part of a would be insurance defrauder was shown by the man who crawled under a railroad station platform and placed his hand under the wheels of a passing train. He had only to put his hand on the rail while the train was in motion, and the wheels naturally did the rest.

The crippled individual was congratulated by the bystanders on his narrow escape from a terrible death, and his explanation that he had stumbled and fallen half under the train was not questioned. But before the company paid the claim it naturally wanted an explanation as to why it was no one had seen the man stumble and fall, and a detective was sent to look into the circumstances. The detective hunted up a number of bystanders, and, finding that none of them could throw any light on the subject, he next inquired into the man's character. The answers he received confirmed his suspicions, and he commenced doing a little investigation on his own account. His first efforts were not crowned with very signal success, but when he crawled under the platform he found the mystery solved for him.

It had been no one's business to clear away the dust and rubbish which had collected for years under the old platform, and it was easy to see where the man had crawled, as he had left a regular trail behind him in the dust. Following this trail, the detective found it led, as he expected, toward the track, and on one of the foremost joists he found evidence of a severe bump by a man's head, quite a number of hairs having been torn out in the process. Collecting these hairs, the detective next compared them with those on the head of the complainant. They were exactly the same color and texture, and the doctor who had attended the injured man recollected a severe wound at the back of his head which would naturally be caused by a man lying on the ground and suddenly raising his head with a jerk.

The claimant was taken to the platform and the theory of the detective explained to him. It was argued that he deliberately crawled under the platform and placed his hand on the rail in front of the last car. The blow on the back of the head was evidently the result of a terrible nervous shock which he had undergone, which had caused an involuntary motion of the spine and neck. A smart man of a legal turn of mind might have been able to bluff it out and to defy the company to prove so improbable a story. But the claimant had more nerve than sense. He promptly weakened and took the advice of the detective, which was to get out of the way before he was arrested. In this case the way of the transgressor was hard, for he lost his hand, premium and all, paying dearly for a self imposed lesson.

Another case in which a man is supposed to have preferred a sum of money down to the use of one of his hands occurred in New York state, where a man, now deceased, claimed compensation for a lost hand under very peculiar circumstances. In company with a doctor he went out hunting, and when he returned he had left behind him his left hand. He had received careful surgical attendance, and his wound was tied up in regulation style. He made his claim with perfect confidence, explaining that he had shot his left hand off accidentally. The doctor confirmed the story, and considerable argument ensued. It was freely suggested that the doctor had been taken on the trip for the express purpose of amputating the hand, and a strong case was made in this direction. There was, however, nothing but inference on the company's side, and the claim was compromised.

A Pennsylvania agency was caught by a somewhat similar trick. A man who had tried his hand at various professions and found them all failures, took out an insurance policy for accident, first taking the precaution to move a couple of hundred miles and assume a fictitious name. A month later he got caught in a thrashing machine, and by aid of the men who helped pull him out was able to put in an apparently unanswerable claim for compensation for the loss of a leg. He had no business to take him to the machine, and that was the only weak point in his case. Still there was nothing to justify delay, and the claim was paid. If the claimant had again moved 200 miles and kept his own counsel all would have been well from his point of view, for in an incredibly short space of time the thrashing machine victim was able to walk with the aid of an artificial limb.

But prosperity was too much for the schemer, who ate, drank and was merry, and as usual under those circumstances began to talk more freely than was quite wise. In a saloon one evening he bragged loudly of how he had beaten the company, explaining that he had lost his leg 10 years before, and that all he had lost in the threshing machine was the willow substitute with just enough of his own flesh and bone to deceive the doctor. A good deal of wonder had been expressed at the easy manner in which he took to an artificial leg, and this lent considerable color to his story. Investigation quickly proved that he had for once at any rate told the truth. He was made to disgorge all of the insurance money he had not spent, and by this means escaped prosecution. The case is chiefly remarkable for the perfect success of the trick and the ease with which it was carried out.—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Dug His Way Out of Jail with Toothpicks.

A Navajo Indian, arrested for theft at Gallup, N. M., was fed before being put in jail. While at dinner he provided himself with a couple of toothpicks. After incarceration, a few minutes' work with the toothpicks enabled him to loosen a piece of wood 2 by 4 that was stuck in the wall next to the cell door. This removed, a large rock about twenty inches square dropped out of the wall into the main room of the jail, where he found an iron stove poker, which he used to pry off the inside door casing. This done, he was a free "Injun," and is still at large.—Phœnix Herald.

An Englishman's View of the Fair.

What I saw when I gained the northern and eastern balconies of the Administration building surpassed and surprised my highest expectations. After all that pen and pencil had done to prepare me for the sight I felt that not one-half had been told me. The great White City which rose before me, silent and awful, seemed to belong to an order of things above our common world. It was a poem entablatured in fairy palaces, only to be done into human speech by the voice of some master singer. It was a dream of beauty which blended the memory of classic greatness with the sense of Alpine snows. It was an apocalypse of the architectural imagination. The wildness of the day lent its own apocalyptic setting to the scene. A swaying, drifting curtain of cloud shut in the horizon, blurring lake and sky on the one side in an indistinguishable haze and on the other shrouding the city in a gloom of smoke and rain.

Ever and again the towers of the fair were draped with wreaths of trailing cloud, while the beating rain and chilling wind added to the elemental effect. The cluster of buildings hung together there, a sort of city in the clouds, yet severe and unmistakable in outline. It was a vision of the ideal enhaloed with mystery. The dreams of Columbus, the aspirations of the pilgrim fathers, the boundless possibilities of the American continent itself—all seemed to have been crystallized in this mute world of hall and peristyle, of column and capital. It stood there one colossal temple of temples, awaiting in silence the presence of the supernal glory.—Review of Reviews.

Repressing Chattel Mortgage Sharks.

Some Boston business men have recently completed a five years' experiment of interest to every large city. They united to suppress the chattel mortgage sharks. They formed a company or association to loan money to the classes who usually fall victims to the sharks. At the time the business men entered the field these lenders were charging the borrowers on chattel mortgages from 3 to 10 per cent per month. The association adopted a uniform rate of 1 per cent per month. It required that with every payment of interest the borrower must make a small payment—about 5 per cent—on the principal.

Since it has been doing business the association has loaned over $500,000 on chattel mortgages. Fourteen hundred and ninety borrowers have been accommodated. Loans have been repaid very fast, averaging about 18 months. The usual experience with the shark is that of becoming deeper and deeper in debt. Last year the association paid a 6 per cent dividend. The object is not to make money, however. It is to earn a fair pay on the investment and to take away the occupation of the shark. Robert Treat Paine is the president of the association.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

London's Underground Station.

The most remarkable piece of underground London will ere long be found beneath the most crowded of all spots in the city. We refer to the large space in front and about the Mansion House, including in this the wide entrance to Queen Victoria street and Mansion House place, together with the corners of Princes street, Lombard street, King William street and Cornhill, and the paved open ground with the trees in wooden boxes, and the statue of Wellington, in front of the western portico of the Royal Exchange.

Here will shortly be commenced a vast excavation of oval form to make way for a great underground electric railway station, an extensive and complex system of underground ways, lighted and open at all hours, for the use both of railway passengers and pedestrians, and a still more elaborate system of what are called "pipe subways," destined to receive our extensive and ever growing lines of gas and water mains, pneumatic tubes, electric wires and like services.—London News.

A Novel Plea For Divorce.

The causes of conjugal infelicity are like the stars in number, but seldom have they been so curious in character as those enumerated by a witness in the divorce court on Saturday.

Witness considered he was the injured party, as the petitioner was continually objecting to the shape of his feet. [Laughter.]

He further said that when he had his hair cut it was never done to please the petitioner. [Laughter.]

She also used to say his upper lip did not suit her.

She was continually blaming him for leaving out his h's in speaking.

He was not so well up in theological subjects as his wife.

And there was sometimes a divergence of opinion when they were talking about the sermon they had heard.

One is not surprised after this to hear that one of the allegations against the respondent is that he had struck the petitioner with The Methodist Magazine!—Westminster Gazette.

How Lightning Discriminates.

A painter named Quinichell was in one room of his house with two women when a storm came up. He took a seat on the bed, and the women sat on his right and left on the same bed. A flash of lightning killed both the women, and the man escaped unhurt. He informed me he only felt a slight shock when both of the women toppled over dead on the floor, but he was frightened almost to death. No doubt was entertained but that he gave a truthful account of the occurrence.—Chase City Cor. Richmond Dispatch.

The Horse's Hat.

The horse's hat, which last year a humane horse owner in Bordeaux provided for his horses, is now becoming a great article of trade in France. It is made of straw and covers the eyes and forehead of the horse, while openings are left for the ears. A sponge is kept in the inside of the hat, and this is moistened from time to time with vinegar so as to keep the horse's head refreshingly cool.

FOR DYSPEPTICS.

A Simple Little Invention Very Popular With Physicians.

WARM WATER AND A RUBBER TUBE

What a Prominent Doctor Thinks of "Laundering the Stomach."—An Infallible Remedy.

"Laundering the stomach" is one of the newest things in medical practice. If the wiseacres are to be believed, it means a revolution in the treatment of dyspepsia. Dr. Cyrus Edson, Dr. Delafield and a few other well known doctors have tried it with such undeniably successful results as to convince them that at last a remedy has been discovered for this most exasperating affection. The good nature of mankind will be correspondingly improved in consequence.

"Laundering the stomach" is a medical slang phrase not to be too literally taken by dyspeptics. It does not involve the washing or ironing of the organs of digestion in the sense that the terms are used in most households on Monday.

The idea of washing the stomach, or, to be more exact, the idea of rinsing it out with warm water, originated in Paris, like many other of the good things in life. In Paris it was used with most gratifying results in the treatment of celebrities who were chronic sufferers from dyspepsia. Recently Dr. Edson and other New York practitioners got hold of it, and after 10 weeks' experimentation they declare without hesitation that within a year's time the physician who does not take in laundry work will be far behind the times.

The operation consists of nothing more or less than thrusting a small rubber tube down your esophagus into your stomach and pouring in through the tube a quart of warm water, which is afterward siphoned out in much the same way as the farmer empties the contents of one cider barrel into another.

The average human stomach holds a quart, although bibulous persons often do not recognize this limit. Therefore a quart of warm water constitutes a "dose," and four doses are given to the patient at each treatment. The water is allowed to remain in the stomach for a brief space, during which a gentle rinsing movement goes on, nature lending the doctor a helping hand, as she invariably does when she agrees with him.

The apparatus required for the treatment consists of a soft rubber tube six feet in length, a rubber funnel, a receiving basin, a pitcher, a gallon of water and a sensible doctor. It is no small trick to put a rubber tube down a human esophagus, nor, for that matter, is it a trick to be attempted by a novice who, in all likelihood, would get the tube into the windpipe instead of the esophagus. The patient throws back his head so that his esophagus is in as nearly an upright line as possible. The doctor thrusts the tube in slowly, and it slides down the mucus lined canal as easily as if it were a spoonful of Christmas pudding and the subject a 5-year-old boy.

The patient experiences a feeling of fullness, which is not strange in view of the fact that his stomach contains a quart of filtered Croton. When the water has been pumped out, he is hungry. After the treatment is finished he is a trifle weak, and in the words of one who has tried it, "Your stomach feels the way your foot does when it is asleep."

Dr. Edson, who has had his own stomach washed out several times, admits that the idea is rather uncanny at first thought, but consider, he argues, how much more sensible it is as a means of purging and cleansing the stomach than the use of vile medicines.

He has one patient of whom he is proud. She is the pioneer among the subjects of the new treatment. When she began its use she was run down, which means that her stomach and her blood were in bad condition. Two months ago she weighed 110 pounds. Now she weighs 160, and her good appetite promises a further increase in her avoirdupois, while after eating she has the blissful experience of not realizing that she has a stomach at all.

This sounds like a patent medicine advertisement. It is not. There is no patent on warm water and a rubber tube. The comparison of the human body to a steam engine is not new. Well, in the human engine the stomach is the firebox, and when the firebox is out of order there is bound to be trouble in all the other parts. Probably if every one masticated his food properly and took sufficient exercise at all times there would be no such word as dyspepsia in the dictionary of medicine. But the contrary is true. Here medical science steps in and tries to aid the man who has been too busy to pay proper attention to his health. Particles of food which do not digest remain in his stomach. They become putrefied and have an ill effect upon the blood, tissue and flesh. The firebox is out of order, the flues are stopped up, and then we hear that familiar sentence, "Doctor, I'm all run down." Now, what doctors are going to do in the future is to clean out the firebox so that nature will have a clear path to go on with her functions.

"If we had known this in time, Mr. Blaine would be alive today," said Dr. Edson. "Here we were puzzling our brains over medicines when lying almost at our feet, as it were, was the simplest of remedies, and the only remedy which would have cured him. There are many other prominent men, now dead, who might still be living had they enjoyed the opportunity of having their stomachs washed."

It is not intended that you should only have your stomach washed when you have dyspepsia. The hope is to prevent dyspepsia as well as cure it. If we are to believe the doctors, one should have his stomach washed every two months or so, just as he has a dentist attend to his teeth at intervals to remove the tartar and to see if there are any new cavities.

It won't be long before a man meeting a friend on the street will hear him say: "In a hurry, old man. I feel all out of sorts, and I'm going to have my stomach laundered."—New York World.

New Method of Mine Ventilation.

A novel device has been used to produce an air current in a shaft in Pennsylvania. A small steam pipe enters the top of a wooden airway for a depth of nine feet, and the steam escaping from this pipe causes a rush of air which obviates the use of a fan. So considerable is the effect of this steam jet that 8,604 feet of cubic air is carried out at the outlet of the shaft every minute.—New York Telegram.

His Interpretation.

A little 5-year-old boy, who had been taught to repeat "Love one another" as a text to speak on his first appearance at a suburban Sunday school, made even the minister laugh when, on his name being called, he shrilly shouted, "Love little girls."—Boston Transcript.

Tryon Died as Burgoyne Died.

There was a remarkable similarity between the fate of Admiral Tryon, who perished when the Victoria went down, and that of Captain Hugh Burgoyne, the commander of the Captain when she was lost. Private dispatches received in England say that the admiral commanded his men to save themselves, but refused to save his own life. When the Captain capsized and after struggling to right herself finally turned over completely, floating with her keel uppermost, Captain Burgoyne, Mr. May, the gunner, and a seaman named Heard reached the pinnace. The ship almost immediately disappeared, but her second launch, with 10 men on board, came alongside the pinnace.

A sudden lurch separated the two boats before Captain Burgoyne and Heard had time to board the launch. The sailor took his commander by the hand and proposed to jump. "Save your own life, my man," Captain Burgoyne replied. The boats separated more and more, and Heard exclaimed, "Will you come or not, sir?" Burgoyne answered: "Jump and save yourself. I shall not forget you some day." The sailor leaped and finally reached the launch, but the captain was not again seen.

He was a descendant of Sir John Burgoyne of the Revolution and the only son of the then constable of the tower, another Sir John. Admiral Tryon was regarded as England's chief defender, and Burgoyne was a skillful and brave officer. It is a singular fact that the two officers served together as lieutenants in the trenches before Sebastopol, being at the time attached to the land service.—Buffalo Courier.

Kept His Wife In a Trunk.

The offense known in this country as sequestration, or private imprisonment, is far from uncommon. Only the other day a whole family was brought up for trial on a charge of keeping an idiot youth in an iron cage until he had lost all his physical as well as his mental faculties, and a similar case is now reported from Evreux, in Normandy. The authorities of the village of Neubourg were advised recently by anonymous letter that a peasant named Lehuby was "sequestrating" his wife.

The gendarmes presented themselves at Lehuby's house and asked to see his wife. This request being refused, they proceeded to search the place from the cellar to the granary, and having found no trace of the woman were about to withdraw when one of them discovered a large trunk and asked for the key. On the case being opened the figure of Mme. Lehuby suddenly jumped up like a jack in the box, and she explained to the gendarmes that her husband would not allow her to go out and that whenever he left the house he left her locked up in the box, where she could scarcely breathe. Lehuby was at once arrested and will be tried for "amateur imprisonment."—Paris Cor. London Telegraph.

Objects of the Peary Expedition.

The chief objects of the Peary expedition include a careful examination of the detached land masses which are known to lie to the north of Greenland, and which have been seen on previous expeditions, not only by Lieutenant Peary, but also by Lockwood and Brainard, little or nothing being at present known of their extent and general character, and the delimitation of a considerable portion of the east coast of Greenland, extending from Independence bay about 300 miles south to Cape Bismarck. This portion of the coast has never been explored, although it was seen from vessels coasting in that vicinity about 200 years ago. He also intends to ascertain the transverse profile of Greenland along or near the seventy-seventh parallel from Cape Bismarck to Inglefield gulf. Along this line Greenland is about 350 miles wide. Incidentally he will also continue the study of the arctic highlanders, a tribe of people who live in the highest latitudes known to be frequented by any people in the world.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A Welcome Ready For Bermuda.

We confess that the proposal of The Sun that Bermuda join us is a fascinating one. Why, indeed, should we not annex Bermuda? It is scarcely farther from New York than is Detroit or Halifax. The people are desirable. Less than half of them are white, to be sure, but three-fourths of the whole population are worthy Episcopalians. An annual budget of $150,000 provides government for these people now, and their debt is a mere bagatelle. Already most of Bermuda's business is with the United States, and our people make up the bulk of the winter pleasure travel. We are frank to concede that if Bermuda suggests annexation a great many of us will take off our hats and cheer.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Value Whisky Above Gold.

There is a law against selling whisky to the Indians in Alaska, yet fully 200 barrels of the stuff are sold there by the whalers and sealers every year. When the steamer Australia leaves for Honolulu, part of her cargo will consist of 55 barrels of whisky, and it is an open secret that it is sent down to be placed on the whalers bound to Behring sea.

The liquor is doctored and adulterated so that by the time it reaches Alaska it has doubled in quantity and is a first class article of "chain lightning." The Indians will give everything they possess for the whisky, and the captains find it far better than gold in trading with the natives.—San Francisco Examiner.

Flies So Thick They Put Out the Lights.

About 9 o'clock Tuesday night Battle mountain was infested with a cloud of tiny flies that drifted into the saloons on Front street in myriads, in many instances darkening the rooms and putting out the lights. When the pests had passed away it was found that the tops of the lamps were covered an inch and a half deep and the lamp chimneys choked. It would appear that these minute flies were attracted by the lights in the saloons, and in countless millions perished.—Central Nevadan.

MOLE CATCHING.

An Englishman Who Makes His Living in a Queer Way.

DESTROYS USEFUL LITTLE ANIMALS

British Farmers Think That Moles are Nuisances and Pay Laborers to Exterminate Them.

Here is the opinion of an old Surrey mole catcher on the matter of the wholesale destruction of our friends:

"Yes, I ketches 'em right enough. I has orders for to do it, but I ain't bin at this ere sort o' work all my days. 'Tis the way o' the world; when your hair's gray they say the steel's gone out o' ye and only the iron is left." This is a common saying in our county. "But I knows better; there's many an old ax cuts better than a new un. I bin head keeper, bless ye, in th' old squire's time, afore these 'ere changes cum. They ain't got rid o' me; I bides here; I might do wuss. But it do seem a most mortal let down, arter shootin an trappin all sort o' things, fur a chap to cum down to mole catchin."

"I should just like to have your opinion on this very subject; no one can have had better opportunities for seeing the matter all around. I should say you can speak as certainly as most as to the good and the harm they do."

"Ah, that's just it, mister; you've hit the nail on the head. There's the good and the harm on 'em. They don't kill game, that I knows; but I tell 'ee what, them hills as they turns up in rough medders, just outside 'o covers, is the very best place fur the birds to peck an scratch about in—them an the emmet hills. There's lots o' things gets killed that ain't no harm to nothing. But you has orders to kill 'em, an if you don't do it you gits the sack. That's the head an tail of my business, as I sees it. One time the farmers killed all the sparrers. They knows better now, most of 'em. As to moles, there was a pretty cry out if a molehill showed in a medder, an on'y some of 'em understands what them little creturs does for the land yet. Fur when there's a bit o' cold, low lying medder ground—most of that sort o' land is damplike—an the moles works it, their runs is like so many pipes laid down.

"Then they knocks them hills what the moles throws up over the medder, an 'tis the very best top dressing a bit o' that sort o' land can have, is that what the moles has brought up on top o' the ground. There ain't no sheep feed like that what they gits off old molehills. An then see here, they feed desprit sharp when they goes at it. They eats all sorts o' things that bides both under an above the ground. They aint in one place, neither, all their lives. So 'pears to me that if they was to level the hills in a medder when the moles had left it things would be all right like. There's lots o' things kills moles besides us as ketches them, both above and below. I've set fur a mole an I've ketched a weazel many a time. An what a many different colors I've ketched—white 'uns, sandy an white, black an white an tortoise shell, same as our old tabby at home.

"When they heaves, things watches for 'em; crows fetches 'em out on it. You ken see their flick like, when they moles gits on the top o' their hills a-working. I've seen they buzzard hawks grip 'em like lightning when I was keepering. Not o' late years I ain't; scarce nothin don't dare show itself now; if it do it has to be killed somehow or other. Moles ain't the right things to get into gardens, that's sure; more they ain't to git on a gentleman's lawn; but these ain't the proper place for them. The fields an medders is, you may depend on it, else what would they be there fur?

"No, I never knowed bad feed where moles worked; but I got my livin to git, an they moles has to be killed, so I does it. It makes it a bit awk'ard when they gits in they big grass medders where they uses these ere new mowin machines; but moles was about long afore they was. If you asks my 'pinion on it, mister, I says they does a lot more good than they does harm. Massy, oh, it does make thet mowin machine bump when there's many on 'em. But that's about all the harm they do; they don't thin the grass crop; where they has their hills the grass is oncommon thick.

"But you an me knows thet these 'ere ideas about things don't help a poor man to get his livin, an if moles wasn't killed the mole catching trade would go to ruin. There ain't such a heap on 'em arter all; one family on 'em—four, five, or even three—will chuck up a rare lot o' hills. They work like 'osses, and is as hungry as wolves, though they be but such little 'uns. I've seen 'em running about like rats in the daylight lots o' times. They'll fight most desprit; some on 'em gets so artful there's no trapping on 'em. Then you has to let 'em bide a bit. An that's just about all as can be said about the good an the harm o' moles. But I say, mister, 'tis a rare drop down fur a chap from a double barrel to a mole spud an they traps, an I be gettin in years now."—Pall Mall Budget.

Enough to Replenish the Burning Lake.

The steamer that has been expected for several days with a cargo of sulphur has arrived. There are 4,500,000 pounds of brimstone in all, half of it being destined for Wayne, where it is to be made into sulphuric acid, and half for points on the Grand Trunk. The sulphur is valued at $50,000. The vessel and cargo come from Palermo, Italy.—Eastern Argus.

University Statistics.

The new catalogue of the University of Pennsylvania shows 1,764 students, or twenty less than Yale, while the University of Michigan has 2,638, or just twenty less than Harvard. In the number of teachers Harvard now comes first, with 253; the University of Pennsylvania second, with 237; Columbia third, with 220; Yale fourth, with 153, and Michigan fifth, with 145.

It Seemed Strange to Him.

The old fellow had evidently been busy with her for some time, for the counter was covered with the different styles which he had shown and his patience was well nigh exhausted.

The lady, rising from the counter, asked the salesman to take out four pieces of different styles which she selected and to lay them alongside of one another. She then thus expressed herself:

"Now that first piece—I think it beautiful, don't you?"

Salesman—Yes, madam, that is a very pretty style.

Lady—But that second piece is too sweet for anything. Do you sell much of that?

Salesman—About 100 pieces so far this season, mum.

Lady—Indeed! But I don't think the style of that third piece is very new. Have you had that style long?

Salesman—Long is it? Begorrah it only arrived last night.

Lady—So! Now I really like the color of that last piece best of all, but I don't think it would be becoming to my friend, do you?

Salesman—I am sure, mum, I can't say, never having seen the lady.

Lady—Oh, of course not. (Looks at them all again.)

Salesman (with a tired expression)—I think, mum, that you will be pleased with either of them.

Lady—Think so? Well, I tell you what it is. I am looking at these for a friend of mine who is sick abed. Would you mind giving me a sample of each of these four pieces?

Salesman (giving her an ugly look, proceeds to cut off the samples, hands them to her and says)—This is the darndest country I was iver in. Now in Ireland when a woman is sick she sends for the doctor; but here, begorrah, she sends for samples.—New York Recorder.

How a Snake Swallows a Frog.

A snake usually seizes a frog by the hind leg, but should it be taken by the middle of the body it turns the frog around, by dextrous movements of its jaws, till the head comes to be directed toward the snake, when it is swallowed head foremost. It is swallowed whole, and at first sight it might seem an impossible thing for a snake to swallow a creature much larger and thicker than its own whole head and neck. The fact is, that a serpent does not so much swallow its prey as slowly drag itself over the creature it devours, being enabled so to do by the elasticity of its skin, and the extraordinary loose way in which the bones of its head, especially its teeth bearing bones, are connected together.

The two halves of the lower jaw, instead of being, as in most animals, tighly bound together in front, can be stretched very far apart. Those bones also which compose the upper jaw can be widely separated, and also separately moved, so that while the frog is tightly held by some of the tooth bearing bones, others can withdraw from their first hold and again implant their teeth farther on. Thus by degrees the frog is drawn within the gullet, or rather the snake draws itself over it, and so engulfs the frog.

Even after the frog has passed down into the snake's stomach its position is for a time externally visible by the local enlargement. Digestion, however, takes place very rapidly. The frog generally remains alive, not only while being eaten, but for a short time after being swallowed.—Quarterly Review.

The Nails from Jesus' Hands.

The "Iron Crown," which worked up the minds of the people of the Middle Ages to such an extent as finally to become an object of worship is, in fact, a gold crown, the secret magic of the name resting on the tradition that the inside ring of iron was made from the nails which were driven through the hands of Jesus at the time of the crucifixion.

But little is known concerning the history of the iron crown until after the coronation of Agilulf, king of the Lombards. It is generally believed that it was made for that monarch in the year 591. It was used by Charlemagne and by all the after emperors of France, who were kings of the Lombards. Napoleon put it on his head when he was in Milan in 1806, saying, "God hath given it to me."

This celebrated relic is now in Naples among the state jewels. It was captured and taken by the Austrians to Vienna in 1859, but was returned to Italy in 1866. Believers in the sacred hoop of iron inside the crown point to the fact that there is not a speck of rust upon it, although nearly 2,000 years old.—Philadelphia Press.

Reform Through Education.

All actual and permanent expansion and integration of society proceeds from the voluntary co-operative action of individuals. The social reformer, therefore, who would work in harmony with the tendencies and laws of nature must direct his efforts toward convincing the judgments and influencing the motives and moral natures of individual men and women rather than toward forcibly changing the customs of society by legal enactments, official pronunciamentos or majority votes under the white heat of an emotional political campaign.

All of these popular and customary agencies of political action are doubtless of some service as educational influences, inciting thought among large classes of people who would otherwise remain passive puppets or unreflecting adherents of conventional social customs; but as means of finally solving and disposing of social and political problems they are lamentable failures.—Dr. Lewis G. Janes in Popular Science Monthly.

Too Literary.

There was a certain disadvantage to his passenger in the knowledge which a Parisian cab driver had of English literature. In Paris—where many streets are named after famous literary men, French and foreign—a passenger called a cabman and asked to be taken to the Rue Milton.

The cabman drove a long distance, and then deposited his passenger, who found upon alighting that he was in the Rue Byron—at the opposite extremity of the city!

The passenger expressed his mind vigorously as to the stupidty of cabmen in general and of the one whom he addressed in particular.

"Just a little mistake in the poet, sir, that's all," said the cabman calmly, and drove the passenger back to the Rue Milton.—Youth's Companion.

Being Pushed Out of a Job.

An old time English parish clerk was much aggrieved because the new rector, a young man with modern ideas, asked all the congregation to join in the responses. "They'll soon be no work left for the church clerk to do," he grumbled, "if all the women and brats be allowed to take the words out of a man's mouth."—New York Tribune.

John W. Mackey has succeeded in effecting a reconciliation between the Prince and Princess Colonna. The threatened divorce proceedings have been stopped, and there has been a complete readjustment of the family difficulties. The princess will return to her husband in June or July with her children, and the prince has agreed to behave himself. The financial affairs are said to have been arranged upon a satisfactory basis.

The Coxey Commonwealers having arrived at Washington, it now becomes an interesting question, What are they going to do? Manifestly, Congress cannot afford them any relief unless it imitates the Roman Senate and provides a free distribution of beer and picnic tickets. If Citizen Coxey could devise some way of stopping the talk in the Senate and getting a vote on the tariff bill he might do the country some good.—S. F. Post.

The Breckinridge trial has done some good. A request was made of Captain John Waters of Kansas to engage in a debate with a woman's Club of Topeka, to which the frightened man replied as follows: "No power on earth is strong enough to induce me to dispute with a woman. If any of them desire to fight me I at once display a flag of truce and unconditionally surrender. As a lawyer I carry this further. Under no stress, no compulsion, no apparently magnificent opportunity for me to air my art, will I ever cross-examine a woman who is a witness against me, and in this I think I have a wisdom beyond Mr. Butterworth."

Benjamin Franklin in May, 1794, left a fund of $5,000 which he directed should be put at interest and left to accumulate for a century. That fund reaches now nearly $700,000, which shows how easily any man with $5000 or $10,000 can get rich if he can loan it at fair rates and wait one hundred years for the returns. Half of old Ben's money was to go to some public purpose for the benefit of the people of Boston. The other half should be put back on interest. With the half to be used, the trustees of the fund propose to build and equip an industrial training school. The Board of Aldermen and three ministers of the oldest religious societies in Boston constitute the board of trustees.

A man who thinks a paper cannot thrive without his support ought to go off and stay awhile. When he comes back half his friends will not know he had gone and the other half will not care a cent, while the world at large kept no account of his movements. You will find things you cannot endorse in every paper. Even the Bible is rather plain and hits some hard raps. If you were to get mad and burn your Bible the hundreds of presses will still go on printing it, and when you stop your paper and call the editor names, the paper will still be published, and what is more you will read it on the sly.

To The Public.

Inyo's representative at the Midwinter Fair, Mr. G. P. Roxford, has informed the Executive Committee that the space is now ready for the reception of exhibits. Small exhibits from all will make up a large general display. The following are authorized to receive exhibits: John Bourland, Bishop; R. W. Thomas, Big Pine; A. W. Erbeshutz, Independence; E. H. Edwards, Lone Pine.

MANITOBA GRIZZLIES.

MONSTROUS BEARS IN THE FORESTS BACK IN THE MOUNTAINS.

Some of Them Tower Six Feet Above a Man, and It Takes Nerve to Stand In That Tremendous Presence—A Hunter Saved His Life by Doing a Circus Act.

Fifteen years ago, said George W. Rae, a Manitoba pioneer, the grizzly bear was so plentiful among the Manitoba Rockies that the Hudson Bay company annually secured many hundreds of their skins from the army of hunters and trappers that had its range in that wild region, but today this fierce and ponderous beast—nowhere so fierce or of such enormous proportions as among the Manitoba fastnesses—is quite a rarity in its old haunts, and I doubt if one can now be come upon without a difficult and tedious journey of at least 300 miles into the interior wilderness of the province.

The grizzly has met with almost as hard a fate as the buffalo, although, from the nature and isolation of its present retreats and the difficulties attendant on hunting and trapping for it, the grizzly bear, like the Manitoba moose, will never become extinct in that country. I believe that the moose, although the flesh of 2,000 of them is required to supply the military stations in the territory alone with fresh meat every year, is as plentiful today in its wild retreats as it has been at any time since the great inroads of fur and pelt hunters were begun in the territory.

I know no reason why the grizzly bear of the Manitoba Rockies should grow so much larger than the grizzly of the same mountains in the States, but a long and varied experience in hunting these animals in their respective localities has proved to me that such is the fact. No grizzly bear that I ever captured or that I ever knew to be captured south of Manitoba measured more than 7½ feet from muzzle to tail, or weighed more than 1,200 pounds. But it was no uncommon thing in the palmy days of grizzly bears in Manitoba for the hunter or trapper to be confronted by one of these monsters 9 feet in length and with a bulk of 1,500 pounds or more. I have seen Manitoba grizzlies that when they threw themselves on their haunches and rose erect towered five feet and six feet above me, and I want to tell you that it takes a man with a large quantity and the best quality of nerve to stand in that tremendous presence and prepared to do battle coolly and with a level head.

Grizzly bears, like all the rest of the bear family, have the curious habit of rising against a tree, and, reaching up as far as they can with their fore paws, making marks in the bark by digging it with their claws. I have more than once come across these measuring marks of a grizzly, as the marks on the bark are called, 12 feet above the ground. Imagine coming suddenly upon a beast like that in some deep ravine or isolated spot almost impassable owing to the down timber heaped and tangled on the ground and surrounded by rocks and thick underbrush. The sight of his great jaws, open and red, and his eyes flashing in fury at you from the enormous head that towers so far above you, is something only to be appreciated when once seen.

When there were buffaloes on the plains, Manitoba grizzly bears were keen and persistent hunters of them. When a grizzly and a buffalo met, there was sure to be a fearful contest, although it seldom lasted long, and the buffalo was usually the victim. The buffalo bull, when confronted by a bear, would invariably charge ferociously upon its big and ugly foe. This was just what the bear desired, and he awaited, erect on his haunches, the onset of the buffalo. As the latter rushed forward with lowered head and was almost upon the bear the immense grizzly threw himself quickly to one side, and with a blow as quick as lightning with one of his great forepaws seldom failed to break his antagonist's neck. A Manitoba grizzly has been known to engage in rapid succession four and even five infuriated buffalo bulls and kill every one of them. It sometimes happened, though, that a bull younger and more agile than his companion succeeded in evading the fatal blow of the grizzly's terrible paw long enough to give in turn a deadly thrust of his horn into the bear's side, puncturing his vitals and making the contest a mutual slaughter.

In general characteristics, of course, the Manitoba grizzly is not in any way different from others of the family. While I believe that a grizzly bear will sometimes wait and precipitate a fight with a man and take pains to put himself in the way of one, in the great majority of cases he will take a second thought about the matter and back out. A queer instance of this disposition came to my knowledge once where a famous Manitoba guide courageously advanced upon three grizzlies, an old she one and two half grown cubs, and, by a series of ridiculous monkeyshines and acrobatic maneuvers within a rod or two of the threatening bears, filled them with such astonishment and apparent fear that they retreated to the woods as fast as they could go.

The hunter's gun had snapped in both barrels, he having drawn on the old bear before the young ones came upon the scene. It was in a fit of desperation that he tried the turning of a handspring and jumping up and down, clapping his hands and resorting to other unhunterlike measures. He had been told once that a hunter had frightened a mountain lion away by similar absurd movements, and he found that it worked to perfection in the case of the three grizzly bears, but he never, even in the face of that fact, advised or encouraged any one to go hunting Manitoba or any other kind of grizzlies armed with nothing more than a capacity to turn grotesque somersaults.—New York Sun.

THAT WONDERFUL DIAMOND.

It Is the Largest Ever Known and Is Worth $5,000,000—How It Was Found.

Captain Jonas Andersen of the firm of Westergaard & Co., shipbrokers of this city, was the center of a group of curious ones recently as he carefully opened a box which had been mailed to him all the way from Cape Town. As he unfolded layers of paper wrappings everybody was on the qui vive, and at last he triumphantly displayed a plaster cast of the newly discovered Excelsior diamond, the largest known in the world.

The discovery of the monster diamond in the Jagersfontein mine was made on the evening of June 30 last. Captain Edward Jorgansonn, the superintendent of the mine, who is a son-in-law of Captain Anderson, was just quitting work after seeing the men out of the diggings when suddenly a bright lump attracted him, and he stooped to pick it up. At the same time a native Basut truck driver saw it and grabbed it. Captain Jorgansonn told the native to take it to Manager Gifford. That gentleman pronounced it a diamond of the first water and worth about $5,000,000. It was a curious fact and much commented on that a firm, Messrs. Breitmeyer & Bernheimer, had just contracted with the company to take over all its finds for one month at a certain price, and the very first find on their contract was the Excelsior.

Extraordinary precautions were taken in transporting it to the coach. A troop of the Sixteenth lancers escorted it to Cape Town, where it was transferred to the gunboat Antelope, and is now deposited in the Bank of England. The British government has offered £500,000 for it, which has been declined. The Chicago World's fair commissioners were very anxious to get the giant bit of costly carbon, and offered to insure it to the extent of $3,500,000, but the proprietors were obdurate and would not let the stone cross the ocean. The stone is white, with a bluish tinge, and reflects all the colors of the rainbow.

It measures 3 inches in length, 2¼ inches in its broadest part, and weighs 971¾ carats, or 7¼ ounces avoirdupois. The only flaw is a small black spot right in the centre. This, however, can easily be cut out. The Emperor of Germany is said to be negotiating for its purchase.—Philadelphia Times.

SWEET PROSPERITY.

Where 1,000,000 Pounds of Sugar Is Made Per Week and Everybody Is Happy.

A Napoleonville correspondent of the New Orleans Times-Democrat writes as follows:

The weather is all that could be desired, and cane cutting and grinding are further advanced than have ever been known. The yield is excellent and the extraction far above anything on record. Mr. L. Godchaux's Elm Hall refinery barreled up 1,000,000 pounds of sugar the past week, the production of seven days' grinding. About 900 tons of cane per day passes through the reliefs, 40,000 pounds of granulated sugar falls from the vacuum pans every six hours, and under the skillful management of Mr. Eddie Godchaux there is no letup in this vast aggregation of machinery, not for a minute. With 500 men under his supervision not one hesitates, but all know their duty and do it by some kind of instinct, as it were.

During the day 100 wagons feed the maw of this monster mill with cane, and at night 500 cars are pulled in with 1,000 tons of cane to appease the ever crying call for more cane. About eight miles of railway are required to handle this vast crop. A Baldwin locomotive will take the place of mule propulsion in a few days. Yet with all this immense acreage and all this cane to handle the indomitable enterprise of the manager has led to the incorporation of about 300 acres more new land, and even now can be heard the terrific blasts of dynamite operating with fatal effects on the stumps that block the progress of the plow.

If any one were to mention the fact that this country was now in the throes of a great financial panic—that is, in this section—he would be sent to an asylum for safe keeping. Times were never better, and altogether prosperity is on top, and everybody is happy.

A Thorn In His Knee.

When a boy 17 years of age, in the year 1850, V. Newell, who now resides beyond Nichols' ranch and is now over 60 years of age, was out hunting and ran in his knee what he supposed was a thorn. It broke off so deep in the knee that the wound closed up, and all search failed to locate it. Mr. Newell finally concluded that he was mistaken, and everybody told him his troubles were caused by rheumatism.

Of late the old gentleman's knee got to be so bad that he had it lanced several times and was treated for rheumatism. A few days ago the thorn worked its way out and was found to be half an inch in length. Mr. Newell says after suffering untold misery for 43 years he now feels easier with the thorn in a little bottle instead of in his knee.—Grass Valley (Cal.) Union.

A Costly Glass of Beer.

Theodore Voeste was today sentenced to 60 days in jail, to pay a fine of $200 and costs of trial and to give $2,000 bond to not again engage in the liquor business. All this for pleading guilty to selling one glass of beer.

Previous to sentence Judge Randolph, who is and always has been an enthusiast on prohibition, asked Voeste if there was any reason why his sentence should be light. Voeste said he had paid regular monthly fines to the city, and as he had now quit the business he ought to be let off easy.—Emporia (Kan.) Dispatch.

The proprietor of a restaurant in Paris recently issued the following notice: "Being desirous of honoring the Russians, who are the country's guests, I have decided to change the name of this establishment, and by the use of a single apostrophe to transform it from the Cafe Divan into the Cafe d'Ivan."—Paris Figaro.

THE "MARBLE MAN."

A Patient Suffering From a Peculiar Disease In a St. Louis Hospital.

There is a "marble man" at the City hospital. He is whiter than the alabaster statue Dixey makes in "Adonis," and the "driven snow" would soil his cheeks. Not only is his skin absolutely colorless, but his tongue, gums and finger nails are devoid of all hint of blood dyeing. He is believed to be the first patient suffering from the peculiar ailment he is afflicted with that ever stepped inside St. Louis. As is proper with such a very distinguished disease, it has a very aristocratic name—anchylostomum dodenale.

A very, very rare little worm is engaged in merrily sucking the red corpuscles, or life giving element, from this poor fellow's blood, and if the unwelcome tenant is not gotten rid of pretty soon the patient will fade away to a shadow and die from sheer lack of nourishment, though his stomach be full of food. Albert Abbink, a young man who came from Germany, is the patient, and he isn't at all proud of it either. He looks like a marble statue, and a very skeletonish one at that, and has great difficulty in moving around owing to his weakness.

Though this peculiar disease, or affection, is very rare in this part of the country, it is common enough in Italy and Germany. The worms are supposed to be in certain kinds of muddy water, and it has been noticed that brickmakers and pottery operatives in the old country are peculiarly apt to get them. When the great St. Gothard tunnel was being dug it was discovered that nearly every workman engaged upon the job suffered from this plague. It was first noted in Egypt, and from this fact the weakness was named Egyptian chlorosis. Scientists are pretty certain that the Pharaohs had it, and some are inclined to believe that the plague of toads mentioned in holy writ was none other than the plague of anchylostomum dodenale.

Dr. Marks believes he can assist Abbink in getting rid of his high toned parasites, several of which now occupy a glass slide under his microscope. They are about an eighth of an inch in length, and under the magnifying glass look like white alligators. They have tremendous jaws and wear their eggs scattered along their backbones.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A LONG ISLAND MYSTERY.

A Skeleton Declared to Be That of an Indian, but There Are Some Who Doubt It.

Justice Cooper and a jury, in the absence of Coroner Moore, held an inquest at Babylon, N. Y., the other day over the skeleton which was unearthed on the property of John S. Foster yesterday by some men engaged in digging post holes. A number of old residents of the village were sworn, but were unable to throw any light on the subject or identify the remains. They all stated that they could not recollect the sudden disappearance of any man. The oldest witness, however, said that the ground where the skeleton was found had never been used as a graveyard.

Charles I. Bedell, a resident of that portion of the town and a farmer, owner of the property, stated that he had plowed the ground in question about eight years ago. From this it would seem that had the body been there then it would have been unearthed, as it was only 18 inches under ground. The jury returned a verdict stating that in its opinion the skeleton was that of an Indian who had been buried about 40 years and had come to his death from natural causes.

The village people generally believe that it was the skeleton of a murdered man whose body was brought ashore and buried.

Mrs. Grant's Hunt For a Home.

Mrs. Grant has determined to make her future home in Washington, and during her recent sojourn here spent most of her time in house hunting. Almost every available residence in the West End now vacant was offered for her consideration through the various real estate agents, and it is safe to assert that she made an exhaustive examination of no less than 50 before leaving for New York with her daughter, without coming to any definite conclusion in regard to a selection. Those that suited her fancy did not suit her purse, and when houses desirable in both these respects were offered for her approval, the locality, as a rule, proved unsatisfactory. Mrs. Grant has not given up hope of ultimate success, and candidly avers her preference for Washington as a place of residence.—Washington Post.

Telephoning Through Snow.

Professor A. H. Thompson, chief of the United States Geological survey, returned from the Black Hills a few evenings ago. The government has two parties in the hills, one at Rapid City and the other at Deadwood. The professor found the Rapid City party entirely snowbound and tells a tale of how he got communication with them. He worked his way toward the men until he came within speaking distance. By that time further passage seemed to be impracticable, but by accident they had occasion to resort to a peculiar expedient. They talked through the snow. The snow acted as a conductor of sound, and with some difficulty they made one another understand.—Denver Republican.

Browne on Insomnia.

Sir James Crichton Browne, the English expert on brain diseases, asserted in a popular lecture last week that insomnia is not attended with such disastrous consequences as is commonly supposed. It is not as dangerous as the solicitude of the sufferer. He suggested that the brains of literary men, who are the most frequent victims, acquire the trick of the heart, which takes a doze a fraction of a second after each beat and so manages to get six hours' rest in 24. Some brains in cases of insomnia sleep in sections, different brain centers going off duty in turn.

A Novel Sight.

Our citizens were treated to a novel sight this afternoon. Anderson Apple, merchant at Helix, six miles southwest of here, drove a flock of 1,200 geese through town for shipment to the city from Helix, and as they crossed the public square each particular goose seemed to be squawking against time.—Pacific Dispatch in Indianapolis Sentinel.

TRIAL BY ORDEAL.

Remarkable Story From India About Catching a Postal Thief.

The narrator of the following story some years ago had charge of a postal division on the western coast, parts of which had seldom been visited by a European officer. The people were for the most part simple country folk and very superstitious. One morning the narrator received information that a considerable sum of money, forming part of the contents of the mail from a head to a suboffice, had been stolen on the road. The whole affair was wrapped in mystery.

The only clew the police had been able to obtain was that one runner, whom we shall call Rama, had since the theft paid off certain debts in the village which had long pressed upon him, but there were no other suspicious circumstances, and the man had 10 years' good service. As a last resource it was determined to resort to trial by ordeal and for this purpose an aged Brahman, who was supposed to possess occult powers and to be in daily communion with the gods, was consulted and readily undertook to discover the thief. All the runners—a goodly array of sturdy Mahratta peasants—were summoned to the office, and under the guidance of a cheyla, or disciple, of the old Brahman we all proceeded to a small deserted temple of Mahadeo, situated at some distance from the village.

It was a desolate spot and bore an evil reputation. The temple, owing to some act of desecration in the past, had been abandoned and was almost buried among weeds and tangled brushwood.

The hour selected was about 6 p. m., and the long twilight shadows gave the place a weird, uncanny look. The old Brahman was awaiting us, and as we approached appeared to be busy muttering incantations. The runners all seemed to be more or less under the spell of the hour, but the look of real fright in Rama's face was quite distinct. The Brahman, having finished his incantations, rose and addressing the men said:

"You are about to face the gods. To the innocent the trial will be nothing, but to the guilty much. In the temple a magic wand has been placed on the altar. Each of you must go in by turns, take up the wand and turn round three times, repeating the name of Mahadeo. The wand will stick to the hand of the guilty one." By this time it was nearly dark. I glanced in through the door of the temple. A solitary oil butter threw a fitful light on the altar, on which an ordinary bamboo stick about two feet long reposed among grains of uncooked rice and rut limes, the whole sprinkled with red powder.

A curtain was drawn across the door, and the men entered one at a time. As each one appeared the Brahman seized his hands and raised them to his forehead, and then allowed them to pass on and join his fellows. Coming to Rama, he went through the same pantomime, but instead of allowing him to pass on bade him stand aside. When the last man had gone through the ordeal the Brahman turned to Rama and said quietly:

"Tell the sahib how you stole the money."

"To my utter amazement," continues the writer, "Rama fell on his knees, confessed that he was the thief, and offered to show where he had hidden the balance of the money. He had succeeded in opening the mail bag without seriously disturbing the seals. The postmaster had not really examined them and so their having been manipulated had escaped notice. Needless to say, the Brahman was rewarded and poor Rama was sent to repent at leisure in the district jail."

Now the natural question is: "How was it done?" Very simply. The temple, the lonely glen, the uncanny hour, the incantations, all were merely accessories to appeal to the superstitions of the ignorant peasants. The "magic wand" was thickly smeared with strongly scented sandalwood oil. Rama's guilty conscience prevented him from touching it, as he firmly believed the wand would stick to his hands, and his of course was the only hand that did not smell of oil.—Times of India.

Overdressed For His Part.

A justice of the peace, who exercised the functions of that office in a portion of the state where such officials are permitted great latitude, had before him a suspicious character arraigned upon a charge of vagrancy.

The prisoner, who was quite well dressed, secured the services of a lawyer in court to defend him. The man pleaded not guilty, and the lawyer in concluding his remarks said:

"What, your honor, that man a vagrant? Oh, no! I insist upon his discharge. Why, see the good clothes he is wearing!"

"Yes, I see them," replied the justice, "and in consequence of their excellent condition I shall discharge him on the charge of vagrancy and bind him over for simple larceny."—New York Herald.

Uses For Rats.

Of all living things rats seem to be among the most repulsive, and when dead what can be their use? But even they are the subjects of production in the industrial arts. The fur is valuable and finds a ready sale. The skins make a superior glove—the gant de rat—and are specially used for the thumbs of kid gloves, because the skin of the rat is strong and elastic. The thigh bones were formerly valued as toothpicks for clubs, but are now out of fashion, while the tendons and bones are boiled up to make the gelatin wrappers for bonbons.—North American Review.

A Battered Legend.

A hotel in Switzerland bore on one of its walls the time honored inscription, "Hospes, salve!" ("Welcome, stranger!") After rebuilding the legend had to be restored, but the painter, who must have had some experience as a traveler, made a very slight alteration in one of the words, and caused it to read, "Hospes, solve!" ("Pay, stranger!")—San Francisco Argonaut.

Testing a Ducking Stool.

An ancient ducking stool for scolding wives is still preserved at Fordwich, England. The other day some antiquarians, anxious to test the apparatus, found a youth who was willing to don female attire and go through the ordeal. The apparatus speedily ducked the lad into the river, but refused to pull him out again, and but for timely assistance he would have been drowned.—London Letter.

MARRIED.

BALDWIN—TYNEN—At the Independence Hotel, May 1, 1894, by A. V. Davidson, J. P., Wiley T. Baldwin to Mrs. Mary F. Tynen.

Numerous land locations are being made in the vicinity of Olancha.

P. H. Mack, Esq., started for Los Angeles Wednesday evening.

The wife and daughter of Paul Bennett, Esq., are expected to arrive from San Francisco by to-day's train.

Essie Gill obtained 86.9 per cent. in the examinations held at the close of the school term. Her name was omitted by mistake from the report published last week.

James Daley came down from Fish Springs yesterday, and reports the mines and miners as doing their share in lessening the stringency of the money market.

Dr. Woodin and J. W. Murphy arrived from their borax fields in Salt Wells Valley Thursday evening. The plant has been placed in position and the manufacture of borax already commenced.

Mr. A. O. Collins, who has been in Independence for several days, started for home yesterday morning. He was accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Blanks, who will spend several days in visiting and sight-seeing in the upper end of the valley.

There are about twenty men employed at Fish Springs and all of them are taking out ore. There are three arastras running and a fourth one will be started in a few days. The hill looks very promising and a considerable sum of money will be taken out during the coming season.

Candidates for office should not be backward in bringing their names forward. Let the people know what you want and who you are. No extra charge for insertion of cards for the four year term. The Wilson Bill does not effect us, we will maintain the tariff as of old, $10 for each card inserted.

W. H. Uhlmeyer met with a very serious and painful accident last Monday afternoon. He was in a corral at his ranch at Big Pine where some colts were being branded, and one of them in running and dragging a rope caught Mr. Uhlmeyer around the leg and threw him against a tree with such violence as to break both bones of the right leg below the knee. Dr. Dorrance was telegraphed for immediately and everything possible done to relieve the sufferings of the injured man.

Paul Pfeiffle, one of the argonauts of Inyo county, came in from Snow's Canyon on Tuesday last and is spending a few days in Independence renewing his acquaintance with his old time friends of the early sixties. Through the aid of some of his Independence friends he has succeeded in disposing of some of his mining property in Snow's Canyon to parties who will immediately put in a large plant and begin mining operations on an extensive scale.

A Cheap Power,

And at the same time a reliable power, are the points to be sought for in purchasing an engine. With steam power a constant watch on the gauge is necessary to prevent accidents, and the expense for engineer is a serious item against economy. The gas or gasoline engine is by far the cheapest power, as it will run all day without attention or fear of accident, and the cost is about two cents per hour for fuel per horse power. For intermittent power the economy of gas over steam is beyond comparison. While these points of superiority are without question, it is important in selecting an engine to get the best; the best in the long run is the cheapest. Do not fail to investigate the striking advantages of the Hercules Gas and Gasoline Engines. Send for catalogue. If you want second hand engines of other makes at cheap rates we can supply you. We have a number taken in trade and cannot take any more until they are realized on. PALMER & REY TYPE FOUNDRY, 405-407 Sansome Street, San Francisco.

A WORD WITH YOU.

It is one of the common beliefs of folklore that to hang a brick on the tail of a jackass will prevent his braying. When I determined to attach that brick to the tail of P. Asinus Chalfant I fully expected that he would strenuously object, and that he would wildly lash out with his heels in all directions, but that fact did not, nor does not, deter me. Content we are to make this issue a purely personal matter. Let this fact be never lost sight of, that never, in any event, in any controversy, have I ever been the aggressor. It is only when assailed that I resent any attack, and when I strike, it is no child's blow, with no mawkish sentimentality, but with all the force and vigor of which I am capable. In this instance, as in all others, I was the injured party. Chalfant accused me of using undue influence with the Board of Supervisors, and by misrepresenting facts to them led them into error. In reply I stated that he was an unmitigated liar, a fact I have proven, and which he admits. I will now add that he is a malicious liar, as he betrays toward me a malice and a desire to do me evil which, I fully believe, would stop only at assassination. I will give a complete history of the matter of letting the Great Register contract: I have printed five Great Registers for Inyo county, and consequently am in a position to give a practical opinion upon the value of such work. I wrote to the ten counties in the State having the nearest population to Inyo county as to the cost of printing their respective Great Registers two years ago. I received nine replies and the lowest price given was 20 cents per name, the highest 33 cents, the average being 25 cents. Upon careful calculation I concluded that I would do the work for 20 cents per name. The terms of the advertised call for bids required the final sheets of copy to be delivered on the Tuesday preceding election. This I asserted, and Jas. E. Parker affirmed, would necessitate the work being done at Independence. That I had no desire to mulct the County the amount of my bid shows. This statement was made to the Board before the Chalfant bid was opened. The reason for the published condition is this: The law provides, first, that a man qualified to vote can register at any time. Second, any man whose name is upon the last printed Great Register is entitled to vote. Therefore, it was the intention of the Board to give to every American citizen the right to fulfill his prerogative of voting, and in order not to restrict this privilege, they desired to give to every man duly qualified the most ample time in their power to register. The law shown the Board by Mr. Bunney, and alluded to by Chalfant, requiring registration to close fifteen days prior to the day of election applied to the Great Register of two years ago, when a complete new registration of voters was made. It does not apply in any manner to the Great Register of 1894. I am charitable enough to believe that Chalfant's statement to the contrary is due only to addle-headed stupidity. I merely called the attention of the Board to the printed advertisement. They then asked Mr. Parker's opinion, which he gave. In my former denunciation of Chalfant, I did not make one statement that was unjustified. In the very first instance he was the assailant, by misrepresenting me to the public. This gave me the right to retaliate. He occupies a public position of trust. If he is foot enough to be gulled by the first sharper he meets how can he be expected to perform his public duties without error? He made statements which had no foundation in truth; made them with malice for the purpose of injuring me, and for the purpose of removing from his path a political rival. Therefore, he is a liar, with no mitigating circumstances to palliate the offense. He said, and repeats, that he did not care for the loss of the contract, but that a wrong was perpetrated upon the community in which he resides by keeping that amount of money away from there. Therefore, I had a perfect right to allude to the expenses of the Chalfant family at the Midwinter Fair, because that amounted to a greater loss to the community than the one complained of. His statement that the matter of his candidacy for the Assessorship is none of my business can only be construed to mean that he has no further intentions in that direction. If he does not find enough logic in the above, calmly delivered, to satisfy him, the public will.

Now, sir, a word with you. And do you take good heed of what I say, and ponder carefully upon it. You have from the beginning been my assailant. You began by accusing me of an act of which no honorable man would be guilty, and wherein you basely lied. When you applied epithets to me you did so with fear and trembling, as is evidenced by the cowardly manner in which you shield yourself behind an allusion to a more potent power. You need not fear, all assaults must come from you; physical as well as verbal; save and except in this one case. You insinuate that there are matters concerning my family which I would not want published. That insinuation is more base than anything you have yet done. Not only do I not fear it, but I demand that you make your word good. But I give it to you strictly in charge, and do you take this warning seriously to your heart, that if you make one statement that you cannot prove before a tribunal selected for that purpose, I will thrash you within an inch of your life, and, no tie or barrier between us will prevent me. You need not have told me to seek you in the kitchen, you would have been found nowhere else; you were intended by nature for a kitchen scullion and pot-walloper. It is a painful thing to bring the blush of shame upon a cheek blanched by age. But you are the aggressor and my assailant, and you have only yourself to blame for any indignity you have been made to suffer at my hands.

IRV. H. MULHOLLAND.

Irv. H. Mulholland started for Los Angeles last Tuesday with his young stallion Osito. The colt is entered in the two-year-old stake to be trotted at Los Angeles next fall and he will be placed in the hands of C. A. Durfee, the owner of McKinney and one of the best trainers in the State, for handling.

INDEPENDENCE IN DANGER.

Fire Causes a Blank on the Main Street.

About 7:30 Wednesday morning smoke issued from the eaves of the northwest corner of J. J. Gunn's saloon building, nearly opposite the Court House. It was discovered in time to prevent any serious loss had there been at hand any ordinary means to combat the blaze, even as against the blustering breezes then prevailing. The town got awakened to a great danger in the absence of a bell, and confined the fire to the one building. How it was accomplished involved the stringing along of garden hose, turning all the water of Little Pine Creek into the channel running directly beside the burning structure; the use of buckets, blankets, axes and noise. The men and boys who saved the adjoining blacksmith shop and Eibeshutz store saved the town, assisted by the ladies who stayed at home and quenched flying sparks.

If our County Supervisors never knew before they could, had they been here, have found out how worthless the lame provisions of the Court House fire hydrant and its accompanying two sections of hose is. An hundred feet more of hose would have saved the burned building, but had the adjoining structures caught the foolish business would not have saved the Court House of Inyo County.

Loss, about $2,500; insurance, $1,700.

Fire talk is in order for several days, but sad experience shows that nothing will be actually done about it.

The Reno Gazette of April 30th says: The last three or four nights have been fruit-killers. The prospects were excellent for a big crop until the snow storm, but that has knocked at least half the fruit crop calculations in the head. The crop will not be an entire failure, but it will not be near as good as it promised a week ago. Here in Inyo the prospects for a very heavy fruit crop were never better, and from present indications we will raise enough for home consumption and be able to flood the fruit market of the whole State of Nevada.

Instructions That Bore Fruit.

President Roberts, of the Pennsylvania railroad, is a great stickler for discipline. Some time ago, while on his way to Harrisburg, the conductor of the train bowed as he passed without asking to see his ticket. On coming through the train again Mr. Roberts touched his arm and said:

"Why did you not ask for my ticket?"

Rather abashed, the conductor replied that he presumed he had his pass.

"Do you know who I am?" next asked Mr. Roberts.

"Yes, sir," replied the conductor; "you are the president of the road."

"Granted that I am. It is your duty to allow nobody to ride over this road without showing a ticket. Always bear that in mind."

The conductor promised to do so in the future and passed on. After the next station had been passed he again came through the train for tickets and, coming to Mr. Roberts, stopped and demanded to see his ticket.

"That's right, my man," said the president, patting his hand in his breast pocket. Then he grew red in the face, and as he felt in pocket after pocket his face became redder. He had left his pass at home. The conductor never moved a muscle of his face, but stood with outstretched hand waiting for the ticket. Mr. Roberts was too proud to back out, and finally asked in a meek voice, "How much is the fare to Harrisburg?" On being informed he paid over the money, which the conductor took without a smile, giving him a rebate check good for ten cents. President Roberts continued his ride in silence.—Philadelphia Record.

The People of Maina.

The Mainotes are not especially prepossessing in appearance, but there is a refined look in the women's faces, clean cut, delicate features, nothing heavy or obtuse. The men are spare and active, dark in complexion and hair, though not excessively so; they wear the beard, which does not grow very thick; the nose is prominent, the forehead high and vertical, the head rather narrow, the face generally somewhat deeply modeled, with a tendency to hollowness of the cheek. The few men who still keep to the national dress wear the baggy blue breeches, gathered in below the knee, which the Greek islander affects, rather than the white kilt, universal on the mainland; but owing to the poverty of the country, costume has been generally abandoned and the rags of European dress have taken its place.

The women wear a broad scarlet stripe round the skirt, which they take off for two years as a sign of mourning for a relative. My guide observed suggestively that there were few of these red stripes in Maina. The condition of the people does not appear to have improved much since Colonel Leake visited the country in the early part of the century; hunger and thirst ever at the door and premature old age; the song of lamentation for some murdered relative, sung by the women as they work the hand mill at night, and the observation of the village head man who conducted him, "If they had not given such precise orders concerning you how nicely we should have stripped you of all your baggage!"—Macmillan's Magazine.

Too Realistic.

During a recent performance of "Captain Lapalisse" at a Valencia theater, an incident occurred which, for lifelike effect, left nothing to be desired. During the said play some of the actors mingle with the spectators in order to co-operate from the body of the house. No sooner had Miralles, the actor, taken his seat in the stalls than a daring pickpocket robbed him of his gold watch. Miralles seized the man by his coat collar and called out in a deep bass voice:

"Police! Help! Thieves!"

The audience, taking this little episode to be part of the performance, roared with laughter; even the policemen joined in, without stirring hand or foot.

"This is no farce," cried the actor in tones of despair. "The fellow has got my watch!"

The voice sounded so natural that the audience broke into loud applause at "such excellent fooling." Meanwhile the thief managed to break away from his captor and discreetly withdrew from the scene. There was general consternation when the real facts of the case became known.—Imparcial.

Quakers Fighting Over a Church Organ.

The Friends' church at Odon is in a factional fight over the use of an organ in worshiping. At the meeting Sunday the antiorganists were barred out, but they smashed in the windows, interrupting the services. Both sides will appeal to the courts.—Cor. Indianapolis Sentinel.

Hailstones Kill a Farmer.

A disastrous hailstorm visited this section Monday afternoon. Nathan John, a farmer, was killed by hailstones while plowing.—Canton (Miss.) Cor. Chicago Herald.

Agassin's Charmed Life.

Frank Agassin, the sole survivor of the cave in the Anaconda mine, is in the general ward at the Sister's hospital in this city. He says he feels a little sorer on his right shoulder and left hip than when first taken out. This is ascribable to the muscular reaction after the terrible strain of remaining fifty-five hours in a cramped position, his left leg doubled up on his breast. There is also a pain in some of the internal organs. The attending physicians at the hospital apprehend no ill results, but say he will recover in a few days. His mind is not the least in paired, apparently.

Agassin was born in Paris and came to this country in 1882. He had a similar experience to his late one when working in a mine near Georgetown, Colo. He was caught in a drift by a fall of rock that kept him a prisoner six days before he was released. Then he had plenty of water, as there was a spring at the end of the drift where he was, and was not cramped as he was this time, having plenty of room to move about.

He had no idea of the passage of time during his incarceration. When he found himself imprisoned, with no possible chance of escape except with the aid of others, he shouted several times, but getting no answer he concluded to keep quiet till he heard something. At intervals he could hear the rumble of cars passing on the level overhead. He made no call for assistance again until he heard the sound of his deliverers at work, when he called out, and to his great relief was answered. He has had an experience such as not one man in a million has survived, and from coming through two such trials successfully may be said to bear a charmed life.—Helena Journal.

Suicide Prevented by a Dog.

A noble shepherd dog, the property of Joseph Langin, has performed a remarkable feat that entitles it to wear a medal for bravery. The brave animal plunged from the foot of Soulard street into the raging torrent of the Mississippi, and seizing a drowning man by the collar of his coat swam with him to the shore, thus saving him from certain death.

The rescued man was Joseph Reinert, twenty-one years of age, who resides in the same house with Langin. Reinert had been playing cards with Langin. Some words passed between them, and Reinert, who had become very morose, vowed that he would commit suicide. He left the house and ran down to the river. Langin followed, but by the time he arrived at the levee Reinert had plunged into the water and was being swept rapidly from view. Langin was helpless to save him, as he could not swim, but his dog, who had followed behind, plunged in and reached Reinert just as he was disappearing.—St. Louis Republic.

Long Distance Telephone Lines.

The long distance telephone system has already attained large proportions in this country. Beginning two or three years ago, in an experimental way, through New England and New York state, lines were next run across New Jersey to Philadelphia and thence onward to Baltimore and Washington. Until recently the line between this city and Buffalo was the longest in the world used commercially, being about 450 miles and giving excellent service. Between Boston and Pittsburg, via New York, communication is often had over 600 miles of circuit. A little while ago a trial was made between Newark and Boston, connecting through Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Erie, Buffalo and Albany, giving about 1,000 miles.—New York Telegram.

Peculiarly Afflicted.

One family in Utica is peculiarly affected. They have hay fever in the house six months of every year. When the trees bud the wife comes down with it, and for two months she wheezes, sneezes and coughs night and day. At the end of the two months she lends the disease to her husband, who keeps it until the grass is ripe and haying begins, at which time he transfers it to his sister, who is also a member of the family. For two or three years the family has been regularly visited by the disease, and now the coming of summer is hailed with anything but pleasure, for it brings misery with it.

He Told the Truth.

An Irish gentleman had a splendid looking cow, but she kicked so much that it took a very long time and it was almost impossible to milk her, so he sent her to a fair to be sold and told his herdsman to be sure not to sell her without letting the buyer know her faults. He brought home a large price which he had got for it. His master was surprised and said, "Are you sure you told all about her?" "Bedad, I did, sir," said the herdsman. "He asked me whether she was a good milker. 'Begorra, sir,' says I, 'it's you'd be tired milking her.'"—"Seventy Years of Irish Life."

A Mountain Dream.

By JOSEPHINE A. BOWEN.

"Tell me, Carol," I said, "if you know why they wish to put you out of the way. You are safe now; don't be frightened, but try to think."

"Oh, I know," she said, bursting into tears; "they have my mother's money, her jewels—all that was hers—and they think that I will want them. They think that I will tell some one who will take them away."

All my irresolution, my miserable dallying, was now at an end. Here was a case for the Vigilantes. I would go at once and lay the matter before them, and I would also go to the legal authorities, if any could be found, and have a guardian appointed for my love. Fool that I had been, to sit dreaming over her portrait when her sweet life was at stake.

"Carol," said I, "can you stay here with your dog while I go to Helena? You must never go back to your home. You are my little girl now, and I must find another home where there is some good, kind woman to take care of you. Dare I leave you? You have Knight, and you see there are strong bolts on the door and window shutters."

She gave me a look that will go with me to my grave. Adoration and gratitude shone from her soul lit eyes, drowned as they were in tears.

"I am not afraid today," she said, "for Mannella and Jose are drinking so hard, and they expect some friends, and they will all dance and eat and drink and forget all about me until they get sober again."

"But they are watching you?"

"Mannella never remembers anything when she is drinking."

"Very well, then. If you do not like to shut yourself up in the dark while I am gone put Knight on the watch, and watch yourself. You can see far down the gorge, and there is no other way for them to come. Keep strict watch, Carol, and if you see any one bolt the door and window. Keep your dog with you and you will be safe until I can return—so good-by for a little while; I shall not be gone a moment longer than I can help. You are used to being alone, Carol?"

"Oh, yes; Knight and I are not afraid in your house," she said, "and we have the other Carol, my twin, to keep us company."

She tried to smile through her tears, and I turned and left her.

I ran half the way to Helena. I was a good pedestrian in those days, and my feet seemed winged, like those of Mercury.

When I reached town and hurriedly told my story there was intense excitement. "Deserve to be hanged yourself," growled some one whom they called "X." "If you knew that this Cleaves was in the vicinity why, in God's name, were we not told?"

"I know nothing of him," said I, "or his whereabouts. I am here to get protection for the child."

"And you shall have it," said twenty voices, and as many men were examining revolvers and tightening saddle girths, a fierce, determined band—the famous Vigilantes of Montana.

I provided myself with a horse and we rode rapidly away. Few words were spoken—none was needed. Every man in that company knew his duty.

We never slackened our pace until we reached my cabin. There the first object we saw was the mangled body of the faithful dog, showing that he had died in fierce conflict. How I got down from my horse I never knew. I only know that I had my dead darling in my arms—my dead darling with a Mexican dagger in her heart—and was crying to God for vengeance.

"Vengeance is ours!" said a deep voice. "Forward, men! Vigilantes of Montana, do your duty!"

In less than two hours, as I was told afterward, the Mexican gang were swinging, with blackened faces, from the limb of a blasted pine.

Look from the window, Jim. You see that marble cross? It marks her grave, and her faithful Knight sleeps at her feet; and some day I shall lie down beside her—my pure, unsullied bride in death. Call it German mysticism, or what you will, but this place to me is filled with her presence and I can never remain away from it. That face, the face of the picture, seems to float in the light clouds about the mountain's crest, and the silvery mists which rise from the valley cast a divine radiance around it, making all other women seem earthly and commonplace. I have dedicated my life and my work to her memory, and wait for death as my wedding day.

That is the story of the picture, Jim. What, old man! crying? So you newspaper fellows have hearts, after all. Let's turn in. The night is devilish cold, although you may not realize it. But under half a dozen California blankets and a buffalo robe you will sleep like a top.

May you write it out in full? Yes; they have the picture—let them have the story to sanctify it.

THE END.

Red Faces and Their Cause.

An acquaintance of mine, a farmer, a man of much book culture, was in town and we went to the theatre together. He insisted upon my eating a soft shell crab with him after it was over, and as the performance had been a long and trying one I assented. As I sat there nipping off the deliciously crisp legs of the gentle crustacean lying on my plate I said to my bucolic friend:

"Ned, what impressed you most at the theatre this evening?" "The red faces of your men," was his reply, and as I took a look at him to see whether he was in earnest or not he added: "I mean what I say, the red faces of your men. It is the result of your barbarous custom of eating a heavy dinner at the end of the day, at the very moment when you are about to enter upon the period of distraction and recreation which ought to follow the day's labor.

"The consequence is these men come to the theatre literally gorged, the blood streaming in lusty rills to their brain and suffusing their faces, a condition which renders close attention to a play almost an impossibility, nay, a real danger. The only reason why your women haven't red faces, too, is that their vanity restrains their appetites; they prefer to go hungry rather than make such spectacles of themselves. Take my word for it, it's all wrong. The array of red faces is to me a pitiful sight. It means the high road to apoplexy, rheumatism, locomotor ataxia, etc."—Gilsey's Letter.

Odd French Costumes.

At a dinner party the other evening the pretty auburn haired hostess was attired in an imported gown of yellow satin with an overdrapery of black net embroidered in gold stars. The under petticoat where the net was gathered up showed three rows of insertion in black and gold, showing the gleam of the satin through. The black net was arranged in a deep Watteau plait in the back, held in place by an immense yellow rosette. The bodice was plain heavy yellow satin cut square in the neck back and front, draped with the gold embroidered net. The sleeves were of net and came only to the elbow, where they were met by long wrinkled black suede gloves. The high coiffure was banded by a narrow black satin fillet with two tiny blackbirds and a diamond star in the very center of the fluffy bank. Black satin shoes, stockings and feather fan of the same hue completed this exceedingly chic costume.

One of the guests who was going to a ball afterward was attired in vieux rose silk, with a deep ruffle on the skirt fringed fully eight inches in depth. The sleeves and round neck were finished by ruffles treated in the same way, and a bunch of chartreuse green tips on one shoulder and a full sash of the same color made this gown look not unlike a harlequin ice, yet very becoming to the blond wearer. An all white crape was made with an underskirt of pale pink velvet. These underskirts seem to mark a new departure in draperies, and are very novel and elegant. The crape was caught up with festoons of white silk ribbon passementerie, interspersed with pale pink pearl beads, and a fringe of the same outlined the very low cut bodice that had pink velvet underarm seams and short puffed white net sleeves, with an inch pearl fringe for trimming.—Philadelphia Times.

Dress in Anglo-Saxon Times.

We find the influence of Roman costume in our own country in the days of the Anglo-Saxons. It might have been thought that the loose, and, we may add, the few garments which sufficed for the climate of Italy and Greece (for Rome borrowed her fashions from Greece) would have been totally unsuited to the raw, damp, chilly atmosphere of Great Britain. We should certainly think so now, in spite of all the warmth of cozily furnished houses and the protection from weather which we enjoy.

How women managed to live and work in those long flowing tunics in days when manual labor was so much more common in all classes, when roads were miry and pathways and pavements did not exist, passes comprehension. It never seems to have occurred to Anglo-Saxon dames to clothe the body in sections and have separate garments adapted to each part. Their idea was to envelop themselves in one long covering, adding a mantle for outdoor wear, while the interior clothing was of the most elementary kind. Greek women only wore one garment under the chiton, and it is amusing to follow the struggles of learned German writers attempting to define the shape and make of this usually invisible piece of clothing, which seems to have been a cross between a low necked vest and a chemise.

Our male ancestors were a little more sensible, for they wore coarse leggins, and their tunics, being worn only to the knees, did not incommode their movements.—Notes and Queries.

Too Brave to Be Killed.

The first white person who made a permanent settlement in the county of Onondaga, N. Y., was Ephraim Webster. He traded with the Indians, became familiar with their language and customs and was for many years Indian agent and interpreter for the Onondagas. It sometimes happened that the Indians, on account of fancied or real wrongs, became offended with him. More than once they threatened his life.

At one time the Indians tied him to a tree and amused themselves by throwing tomahawks to see how near they could come to his head and not hit it. Sometimes the whistling missile grazed his hair. The sport was kept up for more than an hour, during which time Webster did not flinch. His coolness excited the admiration of his tormentors.—Youth's Companion.

AN UNSEEN ENEMY

is more to be dreaded than an open and visible one. That subtile and lurking foe, which under the generic name of malaria manifests itself, when it clutches us in its tenacious grasp, in the various forms of chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague or ague cake, can only be effectually guarded against by fortifying the system against its insidious attacks with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a thorough antidote to the poison of miasma in the system, and a safeguard against it thoroughly to be relied upon. In the event of a malarious attack, avoid poisoning your system with quinine, and use instead this wholesome remedy, unobjectionable in taste and far more efficacious than any drug. Use the Bitters for dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation, kidney complaints and rheumatism.

CLIP SAVE AND SEND TO US

In the first year in which the Aermotor Co. did galvanizing it expended $50,000 in this work, and did not furnish galvanized goods for the entire year either. No extra charge was made for the goods into which this enormous sum was put.

Are you curious to know why this lavish expenditure was made? Are you curious to know how the Aermotor Co. came to make bed rock, hard times prices long before hard times set in? The explanation is this: The Aermotor Co. foresaw that something better than painting was required and foresaw that hard times were coming.

THE AERMOTOR CO. FORESEES, IT LOOKS AHEAD, IT ANTICIPATES, IT KNOWS WHAT IS COMING, IT KNOWS WHAT SHOULD BE DONE, IT KNOWS IN ADVANCE WHAT IT SHOULD DO.

Because of this it has an enormous factory, and turns out an enormous quantity of goods, and good goods. The other fellow is a used-to-be, has been, or might have been, had he known, but he didn't know. It is all in the past. His business is in the gone by. Ours is in the present, the future. His consolation is found in the darkey's statement "It's better to be a has-been than a never was." After we have done and are doing a thing and it is known to be the only thing to do, certain little piping voices are heard saying: "We can do it if you will pay us enough money to do it."

We made the Steel Windmill business, made the model to which the best of our imitators can only hope to remotely approach and in their endeavor to approach it are still weakly experimenting at the expense of the user. Put to return to our enormous outlay for galvanizing. Why did we do it? The reason is this: WE BUILD THE BEST WE KNOW, REGARDLESS OF COST, and we believe we know better than anybody. We know that thin metal, exposed to the air, will not last unless galvanized, but if properly galvanized, will last scores of years. Barbed wire galvanized will last 20 years, and be practically as good as new. How long does it last painted? But the barbed wire is an eighth of an inch thick, while some of the steel used in the vanes of windmills is from a thirty-second to a sixty-fourth of an inch thick, and therefore would last only from a fourth to an eighth as long as the barbed wire, other things being equal, but they are not equal; the sheet metal has holes punched through it and is riveted to thicker and more rigid pieces.

The vibration of the thin parts at once cracks the paint around the rivets, and water at once gets in and rust quickly eats away the thin parts. Some have used galvanized metal and put in black rivets. This of course is not so good as painting since the cut edge of the galvanized metal is exposed and is in no way protected. WE BUILD FOR THE AGES. We wouldn't sell you a poor painted wheel, nor one made of metal galvanized before being put together. If you would pay us double price for it. We build the best we know, and knowing that such things are practically worthless, we have nothing to do with them.

When the section of an Aermotor Wheel is all riveted up, completed and cleansed of rust and impurities, it is then immersed in melted zinc and aluminum and left there until it becomes as hot as the metal is and until every crack, cranny, crevice, pore and opening of every sort is filled, closed up and saturated with the molten metal and the whole 24 pieces composing the section become soldered and welded together as one piece, that you have something that is strong, enduring and reliable. It is expensive to do, and small shops cannot afford to do it. We keep 40 tons of zinc and aluminum melted from one year's end to another, but we have business enough so that we can afford to do it.

One word about the nature of galvanizing. The silvery white coating which fills every pore and covers every portion of the Aermotor Wheel, Vane and Tower is zinc and aluminum when it is first put on, but which, after standing for a time, forms with the steel, a chemical combination or alloy which cannot be melted and is practically indestructible.

The 5th advertisement in this series will show a 4-Wheel Steel Truck, weighing 115 lbs., which will carry 2 tons, and of which we use 500 in the Aermotor Factory. It will be found almost indispensable on any farm or in any warehouse. For 2 copies of this advertisement, which is No. 4 in the series, and $2.50 cash, sent in immediately after the appearance of adv. No. 5, we will deliver f.o.b., Chicago, one of these Trucks or forward from branch houses, freight from Chicago added.

Where we can, we shall make liberal offers to accept copies of these advertisements in part payment for Windmills. If you have any thought of using a windmill this year write us at once, stating what you will need, whether Pumping or Geared, and if possible we will make you a liberal offer.

The Aermotor Co. proposes to distribute $500 CASH, IN PRIZES for the best essays written by the wife, son or daughter of a farmer or user of a windmill, answering the question, WHY SHOULD I USE AN AERMOTOR? For conditions of competition and amounts and numbers of prizes send for particulars to the Aermotor Co., Chicago, or to its branches, at San Francisco, Kansas City, Lincoln, Neb., Sioux City, Iowa, Minneapolis, Buffalo, or 65 Fifth Place, New York City. Pumping and Geared same price, All Steel, all Galvanized After Completion, delivered free on cars at Chicago and shipped to any one, anywhere, at the following prices:

8-ft. $25. 12-ft. $50. 16-ft. $125.

IN THE APPLE BLOOM.

Where no sunbeams with the shadow mingle,
Deep in cells where silence sleeps alone,
Root and fiber share the sudden tingle,
Stirring with a power beyond their own.

Swift the rugged stems throw on their covering,
Far in azure, trembling with delight,
Like a cloud—the apple blossoms hovering—
Lost from morning, drifting pink and white.

In the casks, then, where nor flash nor flicker
Ever lifts the long year's vaulted gloom,
Straightway beads and brims the golden liquor,
Feels the fragrance and divines the bloom.

Bubbles breaking from their dark and dreaming,
Boughs in blossom, roots beneath the sod,
Know their kinship, and alike, in seeming,
Serve the joyous footsteps of a god!

THE LAND SALE.

Ma got into a perfec' swivet to sell the lan. S' 'e, "George, now while the boom is ragin in Virginia, now is the time we may hope for a livin price for our splendid Spotsylvania corn lan's and magnificent medder bottoms. George," s' 'e, "stir your stumps and sell the lan."

S' I, "Ma, when the pinch comes, you ain't agoin to get your own consent to part with the old homesteed."

S' 'e, "George, now that the niggers are free, what is to keep down the bushes and briars? A lone, lorn widow woman, and one gray headed boy of fifty (you know you are fifty, George) can't manage all the lan and stock we've got. Sell the lan, George, and me and you will board at the Exchange hotel in Richmond, with the bong tong of Virginia, in style."

"Ma," s' I, "I don't b'leeve you'll part with your gums and gourds, not to live with Queen Victoria and eat oyshters three times a day. I think I know you better'n you know yourself."

Then ma got mad and cried and said I was "impident and sassy to her," and I'd oughter "carry out her views and uphold her."

Pa had never crossed her livin, nor no body else, so it ended in my postin down to Fredericksburg in the carryall and puttin the plantation, crops, stock, etc., into the hands of McKay, lan agent.

The town was alive with northern capitalists and visitors at that time. Some came to see about their dead, interred in the great Union cemetery there, it bein soon after the war was over. It was like the verse we used to say at school—

Many came to see the wonder,
To seek for gold and search for plunder,

and some few to cast in their lots with ours.

McKay told me of a couple that got off the train that day. Said the man was polite to his wife and gave Lame Bill a dollar.

A lan agent knows how to pick a gent' man right well, though not so well as an old Virginia house nigger. The one who used to tote the wood in for the parlor fire, hang your horse, or carry him to water, and bring your boots.

Thinks I, "I'll drive em out, and show the premises, while ma is in the notion."

So out I go with Mr. and Mrs. Sage, a nice couple, rich and unhealthy, wanting to try southern a'r.

There was a cheerful blaze on the parlor hearth. Ma b'leeves in a little blaze, all the year 'roun, though the weather was mighty mild. Injun summer.

Kesia, the cook, tossed us up a little hot dinner in no time, for we were hungry as an army of locusses after our drive. Briled ham an eggs, fried sassage and hoecakes, and whilst ma poured out the coffee and served cream and October peaches in the gilt saucers I studied her face.

To my astonishment she run on about the fashions—a thing she had took no stock in since pa died.

She wouldn't catch my eye, and I sorter mistrusted her, but carried Mr. Sage all over the plantation, and he was delighted.

"Just what he was in search of. He wanted everything as it stood. The colts, calves, hogs, fowls, 'hat, boots and all.' Thought he would put 'a new barn here,' and 'a hayhouse there,' and a vineyard and 'double the sheep in the medder.'"

Him and Mrs. Sage mapped it off like a picture by the time they were ready to leave next day.

Of course I drove them back to town, twenty miles o' rough roads, and mighty busy time o' year.

I and McKay made all the 'rangements for the transfer of the property, and I come on back home.

Still mistrustin o' ma I kep' cle'r o' the subject. We both shunned it, and durin the followin week I smoked a month's allowance of tobacco, and ma clicked and rattled her knittin needles as if life depended on her gettin that sock finished, and I'll be shot if she didn't knit the leg a yard long!

Byme-by McKay came drivin up in a fine double buggy, with Mr. Sage, to pay down the first installment.

When Cindy ushered 'em in ma dropped her long sock leg and her hands commenced to trimble.

It was a good sale. We were gettin all we asked, and a crackin price it was; for ma thought her dirt was a sight better'n other folks' dirt. Not a hitch—nowhar.

All of us set talkin as friendly as you please 'round the blaze on the hearth. Little black Joe on his own 'sponsibility han's 'roun a waiter of maiden blush apples, and Cindy, the house gal, not to be outdone, gits out ginger cakes and a foamin pitcher of sweet cider.

Ma set shakin and trimbly the whole endurin time.

Mr. Sage he set back in pa's old stuffet leather armcheer, with heels on the fender like comfort itself and diluted about the changes he'd mind to make.

"A hundred Southdown sheep" for the hill parster—an "grainin forty beeves;" "ten acres in turnips" and "ten in celery," and all such wild talk as city farmers indulge in.

Finally the pen was dipped and handed ma, but 'sted er takin it she clinched her hands together hard, and laughin a tremulous little pitiful laugh, s' 'e:

"Mr. Sage, do you know how high corn grows on this plantation?"

S' 'e, "No, mum."

"Then I'll tell"—holdin her hand a foot above the carpet—"exactly so high and no higher. Then the blades turn rusty and red and flop over like dog ears, and a little nubbin comes, the size of my finger.

Mr. Sage sorter smiled, for he had commented on the big cornstubs in the field. Ma gave another dry laugh, and s' 'e:

"Your sheep will all die. There ain't enough grass on the uplan's to parster a rabbit, and the medders are pizenous with chills and fevers, and we're subject to pneumonia and mumps and measles, and it's the worst kind of luck to move at your time of life, anyhow."

Mr. Sage says very gently:

"Madam, I respec' your feelin's," and they walked out on the porch.

Then ma bust out in the pitifullest sobbin and cryin, and she and me had it.

She blamed me, her only son, for wantin in her old age, to turn his ma "homeless and houseless, roofless and a'."

"My son," she says, "the a'r don't blow so sweet and pure over no other piece of God's earth, and things all so convenient to my hand. I could go to my places the darkest night that comes."

Though I'll swear you'd have to travel a mile to go the rounds of her flower garden greenhouse, dairy, weavin house, icehouse and all the fowlhouses and appurtenances. They were located far apart in old slavery days, to give occupation to the niggers, I suppose.

"And, oh, George, my two babies in the graveyard, and I'd picked out my own place by your pa's side. I'm like an old tree. I can't stand transplantin. Oh, son, to think of your doin such a cruel hearted thing in my old age!"

"But ma," I says, tryin to defen myself.

"And George, I don't know but it's wrong to go off and desert our niggers. The old ones that raised us and the young ones we raised. It's not their faults they are set free, and they mind their 'old miss' as well as ever they did (I always spiled 'em some), and it's only the triflin no 'count ones gone off to the Yankees, any way."

Seein I agreed with her, she went on. "There's old Villet with her rheumatiz, and Crazy Jane, who's harmless as a robin, and your pa's old dropsified butler, and Blind Jim boy, that used to drive the blooded Morgan horses when your pa came a-courtin me.

"Who'd physic 'em and scold 'em and see they don't starve? George! it would be a sin to desert 'em at their times of lives."

Women may be no great shakes at hard, soun reasonin, but ma's a very pretty talker indeed, and, by grabs, I felt sorter so myself and downright aggravated with McKay. What call had he to fly off like a potleg in such a sudden swivet to oust us from the property which had belonged to our generation ever since William the Conqueror, and for aught I know helped him to conquer it?

The honor and glory of settin up in a stiff starched collar at the Exchange hotel, hobnobbin with the Virginia legislatur', and the judges, and the bong tong would be but a poor compensation for my pack of houn's and brood horses, and the foxes and birds and things I was used to. I would be but a lone, lost boy, cast adrift, even if I did eat oyshters three times a day.

"Ain't there no way of gettin out of this trap?" says ma, wipin her eyes on the long sockleg.

"I b'leeve I'd die anywhere else."

"If we pay McKay his commission and persuade Mr. Sage to give out the notion," says I doubtfully.

"How much is the commission, George?" she asked eagerly.

"It amounts to $98.70, but"—

"George," she spoke quickly, "if you will step out to the stables for awhile I think I can compose my mind and solemnize my thoughts."

The colts came whinnyin to meet me, and rubbed their noses on my shoulder, the calves, the pigs, everything in the yard came at me in a body.

I got a hamper of nubbins and scattered 'em, and somethin kep' gettin in my eye, and I thought I would actually blow my blamed nose off; and the more I thought of McKay's officiousness the madder I got. But when I got back to the parlor it was quiet as a church, and there was ma out at the yard gate biddin the gent'men "far' well." Such was her haste to get them off and away.

My dear old mother! Her eyes shone bright as a young girl's—she smilin and lookin as pleased as if she'd been left a fortune.

Mr. Sage smiled, too, and bowed over her thin, wrinkled hand like a true hearted gent'man.

Ma had carried all her pints with Mr. Sage; then run and got the shotbag she had kep' her egg and chicken and butter money in for forty years. She paid McKay the commission, and begged and plead with him to go away and never come there on no such erran' again, so long as she was on top of God's earth.—Eva M. de Jarnette in New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Labouchere's Opinion of Beaconsfield.

A famous scene in the house, with which Mr. Labouchere's name must go down to parliamentary history, is that which took place when the proposition was made for a memorial monument to Lord Beaconsfield. Mr. Gladstone made a powerful speech amid general cheering, disclaiming any intention or necessity for considering the political character of Beaconsfield. "We are here," he said, "to place a wreath on the bier of a champion who has fallen among us."

The house was impressed by Mr. Gladstone's speech, and the applause had scarcely died away when Mr. Labouchere was on his feet. He was greeted with cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!" coming cheerfully from a number of benches. But he pitched into Gladstone tooth and nail.

He was surprised, he said, that the Liberal leader should allow his generosity to outweigh all other feelings. For his own part he was willing to admit that Beaconsfield had great gifts, but he felt obliged to consider how they were applied. He did not think that England had any reason to be grateful for anything that Beaconsfield had done. It was impossible for him to separate the man from the minister, the statesman from statesmanship.—London Cor. New York World.

Cowboy Hospitality.

I never visited a house in the cowboy region and found locks on the doors. The room where I slept at the Brooks ranch had an outside door, but no lock. Our tents were left day after day, and although we occasionally knew that cowboys had stopped and helped themselves to food nothing else was taken. I was told that a man had not been arraigned for stealing in Natrona county in several years. I was riding with Brooks one day when we came to a sheep wagon. The herder was gone, but everything was lying about loose. Being hungry, Brooks made a fire, and we cooked a meal. While we were eating, the herder returned.

I expected trouble, but he simply expressed his regret that he had no butter and aided us to find several things that had escaped us. If you stop at a house to stay all night or eat a meal you are never expected to pay. A tramp who owned a horse could live magnificently in that country by traveling from house to house. When a cowboy is out of a job he travels about, finding free entertainment every where until he finds work. Settlements are few and far between, and the people are always glad to see visitors.—Cor. Topeka Capital.

A STRANGE SCENE.

Terrible Midnight Vision of King Charles XI of Sweden.

A LEGION OF THE ROYAL CASTLE.

Ghastly Execution Witnessed by the King.—The Assassination of Gustavus III.

There is a legend attached to the royal castle of Stockholm which is very weird in its way, and which is often told by Scandinavians around the fire on winter evenings. It is the tale of a vision seen by King Charles XI—a vision which is supposed to have presaged the assassination of Gustavus III and the consequent decapitation of Count Ankerstrom, the assassin, and his associates. Thus runs the story: King Charles, in deep grief at the loss of his queen, whom he had passionately loved, was sitting in his apartment one night. In attendance were Count Brahe, his aid-de-camp, and the king's physician. The bereaved monarch had given no encouragement to conversation, and silence had reigned for some time, when the castle clock struck the hour of midnight. The king rose and expressed his wish to retire for the night. He asked what kind of a night it was, and the count went to the window and withdrew the curtains—and immediately stepped back in amazement. The royal castle in Stockholm is an immense pile of buildings surrounding a vast courtyard. The Swedish diet (parliament) is domiciled within the precincts of the castle, and when in session occupies now, as in King Charles' day, a great hall opposite to the royal apartments. From the long row of windows streamed a blaze of light. Parliament was not in session, and the illumination at this midnight hour was wholly unaccountable. The king commanded Count Brahe to summon the marshal of the castle to his presence. The old man came in a state of bewilderment and trepidation, and could of course give no explanation of the mystery. The king determined to ascertain the cause for himself, and, bidding the seneschal precede him with his lantern and keys, he crossed the deserted courtyard with his two attendants. Entering the vestibule of the diet hall, they became aware that the walls were hung with black cloth, entirely covering the faded tapestries. Awed and impressed, the party stood silent and undecided for awhile, a murmuring of many voices, evidently proceeding from the great hall, being faintly but distinctly audible. Deciding to solve the mystery at all hazards, the king commanded the seneschal to open the door forthwith. In mortal terror the old servant fell on his knees and implored his majesty to forego his determination, declaring his own inability to obey his king's command. Turning to the count, the king bade him open the door. "Your majesty can bear me witness," said Brahe, "that I have always done my duty in defense of my king and country. I fear no mortal foe, but I confess I have no courage to face those of another world, in whose awful presence we evidently stand."

The physician likewise showed his timidity or unwillingness, whereupon the king snatched the key from the hand of the seneschal, exclaiming, "I perceive that these things concern myself alone!" Without further hesitation he opened the door and crossed the threshold, his attendants following, in fear and trembling, but ashamed to desert their master.

A parliament was in full session, and the vast hall was crowded with people. None looked at or seemed to be aware of the king and his party as they entered. A noticeable thing was the unfamiliar garb of the members of the midnight parliament; it was not that of the period nor that of the past. The Swedish rigsdag, or diet, of that day consisted of a supreme council and president and the members of the four estates of the realm—the nobles, clergy, burghers and the peasants. As usual, the benches in the lower part of the hall were occupied by the peasant members; above them sat the burghers, the clergy and the members of the nobility, according to their degree. At the extreme upper end of the great apartment was a raised dais occupied by the supreme council, or court, and the president. In the center appeared a magnificent bier, upon which rested a corpse partly covered with a velvet mantle displaying the royal arms of the house of Vasa. A large open space intervened between the raised platform and the first benches of the nobility. In the midst stood a block, and the headsman leaning on his ax.

The murmuring had gradually died away into silence. An eager and horrible suspense was appearent in the faces of the assembly. Presently the president arose, a gigantic figure, but bent with age, and made a sign, whereupon a woeful procession of men, bareheaded and with manacled hands and attended by guards in strange uniforms, was seen issuing from a side door and approaching the scaffold. Another sign from the president, and the first man knelt down and was dispatched by the headsman. One after another came up and suffered his doom, deluging the floor with blood. The last, a man in middle life, was evidently the chief criminal. He lifted his hand in defiance at the judges and then laid it on the block. It was severed at once by a stroke of the ax. The head followed immediately and rolled in a strange manner up to where the king stood, seemingly bespattering his feet with blood. In amazement and horror the king exclaimed in a loud voice, "Merciful Lord, is this to be in my reign, or does it forbode the future?"

The response came from the aged chief and was repeated by the multitude, "Woe, woe, woe, to the blood of Vasa!" The words, though faint and distant, were distinctly heard. As the sounds died away the light faded and the figures grew dim and shadowy, and soon the whole vision vanished. The guest hall was empty and dark, save where the seneschal's lantern made the gloom visible. In the antechamber the worm eaten hangings appeared as usual. When the king reached his apartments, having sworn his attendants to secrecy, he commanded the physician to place on record the portentous scene which they had all witnessed that night. He then affixed his signature and seal. The attendants likewise signed the document, which is said still to exist among the secret archives of the Vasa family.

PATROL WAGON AS A CARRIAGE.

How a Funny Police Captain Rode Home From a Sociable.

Quite a good story was found drifting about the other day on the surface of life. It concerns Lieutenant Hayes of the police force, who was once a captain and located at the Desplaines street station. The captain was considered an excellent brother-in-law of the church, and one night he laid down the cares of office long enough to accompany his family and some friends to a church sociable. The night was not a pleasant one, and when the hour came for dispersing there was good reason for not wishing to walk through the streets. A rain was falling, and the wind was blowing. Carriages were most decidedly in order.

All through the festivities of the evening the captain had borne a master hand at entertainment. He had made jokes, and the jokes had been laughed at till the general impression of him was that Captain Hayes was a monstrously funny fellow. Of course a police captain on the West Side wields a good deal of power of one kind and another, and he doesn't have to exert himself as a common man would to achieve applause. Some philosopher once remarked, observing that all good Frenchmen were laughing at the bonmots of Napoleon, that "an emperor can be funny with a very little wit." In a modified way this was true of the captain. True, his jests had been merry, in a manner, but none of them possessed the humorous merit of his leave taking.

Just as the rest of the guests were grumbling about the door and dreading the plunge into darkness and rain Captain Hayes disappeared from the scene for a moment, ran down to the corner and tarried a moment at the patrol box.

Then he came back and gathered his flock about him. By the time all their wraps were adjusted there was a clatter of hoofs on the pavement, the startling peal of a gong, and there at the curb stood a patrol wagon.

Captain Hayes hustled his family and friends inside, climbed up behind them in regulation copper style, gave a word to the driver and vanished into the darkness.

"Taking them home from a church sociable in a patrol wagon!" exclaimed one matron, speechless thereafter at the captain's humor.

"Yes," said her husband, dutifully laughing at the captain's last joke. "That's the funniest thing he has done all the evening."

The captain still possesses a very fine sense of humor.—Chicago Herald.

Placing the Furniture.

Take an absolutely impassive face, draw the lines of the mouth upward, as in a laugh, and the effect is agreeable; draw the lines downward, as in grief, and they are most decidedly disagreeable.

Straight lines as well as curved lines produce the effect of solidity, durability and support. This is a constructive axiom, accepted from the earliest ages. On this principle wainscotings, doors and mantels are built in straight and curved lines. But it would be manifestly wrong to furnish a mantel with ornaments whose tops or proportions would give a rounding or straight effect unless you desire such a room to be stiff and prim.

The poplar tree, with its upshooting branches, forming down pointing angles, has a look of cheerfulness about it, while the willow with its drooping branches, forming up turning angles, produces quite an opposite effect and in all countries typifies mourning and sadness.

If, in the putting up of decorations, we see to it that lines from the tops of the different objects with which we are to decorate a mantel form angles pointing downward, then the effect produced will be cheerful. If the points of the article point upward, the effect will be opposite.—Upholsterer.

Children's Eating.

Some parents compel their children to eat against their will, as when they come to the breakfast table without an appetite, or have lost it in prospect of a visit or a ride, or for the sake of "eating their plates clean" in discouragement of wasteful habits. Unless we are thirsty we cannot drink the purest spring water without aversion, and as for eating when there is no appetite it is revolting, as any one may prove to himself by attempting to take a second meal in 20 minutes after having eaten a regular dinner. The appetite, the hunger, is excited by the presence of gastric juice about the stomach, but if there is no gastric juice there can be no hunger, no appetite, and to compel a child to swallow food when it is distasteful is an absurdity and a cruelty, in the opinion of Hall's Journal of Health.

Irish Home Rule.

It is time for plain speaking about the Irish situation. It is folly for Ireland or the friends of Ireland to delude themselves with false hopes of the triumph of home rule in the near future. The last hope vanished with Gladstone's retirement. The day of home rule for the Irish people is still a long way off. Lord Rosebery knows it. Mr. Gladstone knows it, and the knowledge was one of the principal causes of his resignation. The leaders of the Irish party, in their secret hearts, know it.—London Cor. New York Sun.

SHUT-IN SOCIETY.

A Unique and also Very Helpful Organization for Invalids.

WORK DONE BY UNFORTUNATES.

Letters Written From One Invalid to Another Which Resulted in Fast Friendship.

Fifteen years ago Miss Jennie M. Drinkwater, now Mrs. Conklin, of Madison, N. J., was shut in her room by a long and serious illness. Time hung heavily on her hands, and she conceived an idea so simple, and yet so obviously full of common sense, that the wonder is that some one had not thought of it long before. She entered into a correspondence with another invalid personally unknown to her, in order that they might be mutually cheered and entertained. This was the origin of that remarkable organization of invalids known as the Shut-In society, which has a membership of many thousands in every country of the civilized world.

The correspondence so modestly begun proved so pleasant that it was extended to other invalids, until in 1884 the correspondents organized themselves into the Shut-In society, and the next year the society was incorporated under the laws of the state of New York, with Mrs. Conklin as president. Of course the primary qualification for admission is illness. "To be a sufferer shut in from the outside world constitutes one a proper candidate for membership in this society," says the constitution. But there is a character qualification also, and all applicants for membership must "send with their application, if possible, the name of their pastor or their physician, or of some associate member of the society, as an introduction."

The associate members are not invalids, but "being in tender sympathy with the suffering, volunteer in this ministry of love." Each associate member volunteers to correspond with members in a certain assigned district and is expected to subscribe at least one dollar a year.

The society is managed by an advisory board composed of associate members. As might naturally be expected, the society is largely composed of women. There is a man's department, however, under the direction of Mr. Will S. Mather, of Chicago. There is a flourishing children's department, the members of which are popularly known as the "sunshine makers." It is under the direction of Miss G. L. Lewis, of Boston, and Miss Josie A. Jones and Miss Abbie A. Miller, of Dorchester, Mass.

There is also a department of children associate members, which have formed themselves into a band called the Little Cup Bearers to the King. It is composed of boys and girls from six to nineteen years of age, who pledge themselves to carry sympathy and comfort to some little sufferer. It is found that children enter into this work with great enthusiasm, and the little cup bearers have helped many a poor and weary sufferer to become a sunshine maker.

Another department of the society is the wheelchair committee, of which Miss C. O. Ross, of Newark, N. J., is the active manager. Its object is to alleviate the condition of the shut in members by furnishing them, when possible, with a wheel chair. When a wheelchair invalid dies, a little silver plate is fastened on the back of the chair inscribed, "To the memory of ———," and it is sent back to the committee, to be used by some other member. The King's Daughters are interested in the wheelchair work, and in fact a number of circles of King's Daughters have been formed among members of the Shut-In society. Many of the members themselves work for the wheelchair committee.

The library of the society is one of its important features. Books, magazines and papers are freely sent to invalids in every state in the Union, as well as to many foreign countries. In Philadelphia a Pass-It-Along club has been formed, which circulates periodicals among invalids. The Open Window is the name of the excellent monthly publication issued by the society.

It is an interesting fact that a missionary spirit has been developed in this society, although its members might well be excused if they thought only of themselves. There is an "Invalid's auxiliary," which is now supporting a native nurse in the Margaret Williamson hospital at Shanghai, China, and is also raising a fund to endow a bed in the same hospital, to be known as the "Shut-In society's bed." Another branch of missionary work done by the society is the writing of letters to prisoners. About 1,700 letters have been sent to Sing Sing alone. They are sent unaddressed to the chaplain, who addresses them personally to the convicts. The name and address of the writer are not, however, given to the convict. It is the testimony of the chaplain that these letters have done much good.

The letters written by invalids to other invalids have resulted in many warm friendships, and the term "letter friend" has become a recognized phrase in the society. The organization of the society has brought out the fact that a surprisingly large number of invalids have been "shut in" for a long term of years, many for twenty-five or thirty years. One member of the society, who died last year, had been confined to her bed for sixty years.

The condition of such long term patients is apt to become very desolate, as their early friends die or drop away and they are made to feel that they are a burden on those who are charged with their care. To such invalids the society comes as a blessed boon, for it not only puts them in direct communication with many fellow sufferers and sympathetic friends, but the various interests of the society give them something to think of, and thus break the dreary monotony of their lives.

One of the best known members of the society is Miss Jennie Casseday, of Louisville, who has been confined to her room for twenty-five years. She has acquired a widespread reputation as the founder and national president of the Flower mission.—New York Tribune.

A Trifle.

Agnes (fluttering)—Oh, is that you, my lord?

His Lordship—Yes. You seemed very much frightened.

Agnes (nervously trying to control herself)—Yes; I get frightened at the least little things of late!

And that is why his nibletts didn't pop.—New York World.

Very Strange.

Mrs. Park Rowe—I hear your husband is home sick.

Mrs. Juggerly—Why, he isn't exactly sick, but I think it's overwork, for he certainly does act strangely. Today, for instance, a circus parade passed the house, and he wanted to know if it was real.—Brooklyn Life.

GHOSTS AT HAMPTON COURT.

The Apparitions Still Startle the Inhabitants of the Place.

The ghosts at Hampton Court palace still are said to frighten the inhabitants and officials of the place, and even visitors, it is declared, are not exempt, several of them having terminated their visits abruptly owing to the noises they have heard. A resident in the palace sends to the London Graphic an account of an apparition seen by an attendant in the gardens, who was sitting on a bench waiting for the inspector to pass on his rounds at night, when suddenly he felt a hand laid upon his face, and looking up saw a tall, pale lady dressed in gray. He sprang up at once, but she vanished before his eyes, and the shock caused by the apparition was so great that he had to resign his post. He became so nervous that he was absolutely afraid to remain in the gardens at night.

Nor are the ghosts confined to the gardens, for a few nights ago two of the maid servants, fancying they smelled something burning, went down one of the staircases in the middle of the night and met a tall, pale lady with "a reflected light on her face" and dressed in black. She, too, vanished through one of the queen's gates, though the door itself was shut, and no footsteps could be heard. Other servants in the palace have been visited by these royal ghosts. One servant declares that she felt something come and touch her face in the dark when she was asleep in bed, and another maid sleeping in the next room called out to her to "leave off walking about her room," as she heard footsteps moving about. Several visitors to the palace have noticed extraordinary noises in a particular room, and only a few months ago two ladies were standing talking near this room at about 11:30 one night when they heard a loud crash and saw a brilliant light flash through the room, a sight which they could not account for in any way. The Graphic's informant is positive that no practical joker is the author of the disturbances, as has been suggested in some quarters.

Peculiarities In Massage.

Light friction of a part reduces surface temperature. In 10 experiments on healthy adults, whose armpit temperature on both sides was equal, and whose free surface temperature on the surface of both forearms was before massage 88 degrees F. or more, it was found, on subjecting the left forearm to gentle upward friction, that while the temperature in both armpits and in the untouched free surface of the opposite limb remained constant, the temperature of the left forearm fell in all cases more than two degrees and in three cases nearly four degrees.

After firm friction, rolling, squeezing and kneading of the skin of the limb in all cases, the free cutaneous temperature rose to 95 degrees, but the armpit temperature remained the same on both sides, while in seven cases an interesting phenomenon was noticed on the opposite side—viz, the right limb sensibly perspired and the free surface temperature of the untouched forearm fell to 84 degrees during the time that the firm friction of the left limb was in progress. In regard to light friction it has been impossible to detect any effect on the patient's sense of locality or on the temperature sense. After firm friction of a part for five minutes comes a decided increase of the sense of touch, and the sense of locality has in most instances been apparently improved.—New York Ledger.

The Pope Joan Legend.

In spite of the learned historian by whom the story has been refuted, there is still a widespread popular belief that there existed in the middle ages a female pope. Pope Joan, as she is called, has even given her name to a game of cards, which is mentioned in Sheridan's "School For Scandal."

The tradition with regard to the female pope has been traced back to the eleventh century, but she is said to have lived much earlier, her pontificate having taken place in the ninth century and having lasted for more than two years. The name she is alleged to have assumed is John VII. At the last meeting of the Academy of Inscriptions in Paris, M. Muntz dealt another blow at a story which Gibbon, who cannot be suspected of Catholic prejudices, considered had been "annihilated" by two Protestant critics, Blondel and Bayle.

M. Muntz characterizes the legend as a vulgar fable invented in the middle ages. Never, he declares, after a careful study of the question, has a woman worn the tiara, and moreover there was no interregnum at the period when the pretended John VII governed the church.—London News.

The Kola Nut as a Stimulant.

Half a kola nut will, says Mr. C. F. Scott Elliott, in his report on the botany of Sierra Leone, enable a man to go without food and support great fatigue for 24 hours or more. It is an excellent nerve tonic, and is especially good for keeping the brain clear and active at night. It prevents sleep, however, almost too thoroughly, and should not be taken less than four hours before bedtime. It is said to remove immediately and thoroughly the unsteadiness and stupidity due to drunkenness. It grows freely everywhere, thrives wherever planted, seems to require no special condition of soil and yields at the rate of £800 per acre. Another property attributed to this nut is that of rapidly clearing foul water and improving beer.—Invention.

Poisonous Saliva.

The saliva of dogs and cats is especially rich in bacteria, that of the latter containing a form which is seldom observed and so fatal that rabbits and guinea pigs inoculated with it die in 24 hours. The dog's saliva contains an even greater number of bacteria plus occasional eggs of intestinal worms and so on. Those fond and loving women who are prone to waste their caresses upon lapdogs will be interested in this item.

A VEILED WOMAN.

A Mysterious Stranger Visits the Prison at Sing Sing.

WATCHES THE PASSING PRISONERS.

She Sees all the Uniformed Prisoners in Their Lock Step March, but no one Knows Her Name.

Sing Sing prison has a mysterious woman visitor, but that is not remarkable, because seven-eighths of the visitors to the convicts there are women. They all have burdens of sorrow to bear, but rarely of their own making, and they come and go, year in and year out, to see loved ones whom the world does not love and has put behind bars. The gray prison walls hold all that is dear in life to these mothers, wives, sweethearts and sisters.

Many a romance brought to a tragic climax by the merciless hand of the law is suggested by these untiring visitors. Even the ubiquitous hackmen who infest the Sing Sing railway station seem to appreciate this, for when these unhappy ones alight from the trains and look uneasily and self consciously about the drivers realize intuitively the nature of their errand and treat them with a deference rarely met with in their class. They approach respectfully, and in subdued tones say kindly, "To the prison, madam?" or, "Right this way to the prison."

About one visitor only is there any mystery. Others give their names and go to see some convict who is known to the keepers. This one goes veiled, and no one knows who it is she goes to see.

A tall, lithe, graceful woman, attired all in black and wearing a heavy black veil, occupied the seat in a car directly in front of and opposite that occupied by a World reporter one Saturday recently.

She was uneasy and restless, though not obstrusively so. She carried herself with the fine reserve of a woman of breeding accustomed to do just such things. Sometimes she would look anxiously about the car, as if in fear of being recognized, though with her veil recognition, even by an intimate friend, would clearly have been impossible.

An old time hackman at the Sing Sing station approached her as she alighted. She got into his ramshackle conveyance as if she had been in it before, and it rattled up the hill and over the stony road along the bluff to the prison a few hundred yards in advance of the equally noisy conveyance of The World man.

It was the hour at which the convicts, having finished their evening meal in the great feeding hall—it would raise the ghost of Brillat Savarin to call it a dining room—march in lockstep to their cells in long single files. They come through the stone flagged prison yard with a steady, machinelike shuffle of their heavy prison shoes. Keepers stand about with heavy sticks in their hands.

Near the entrance to the long granite building containing the tiers of cells are two great open boxes of bread. Each striped miserable reaches out and takes a piece with his left hand as he passes. Slung on the right arm of each is an iron slop pail, on which is painted the prisoner's number. The shuffle of the slowly moving line continues for perhaps 20 minutes, at the end of which time each of the 1,300 has, with his supper in one hand and his slop pail in the other, been locked in his cell.

The woman had been shown to the yard and stood, a keeper by her side, under the portico of the inhospitable looking hospital building. The long lines of convicts marched toward her and turned not 10 feet from where she stood and marched past the breadbox into the building. She supported herself with one daintily gloved hand against the stone wall, and leaning forward in an attitude of eager interest faced down the approaching line.

She tapped the pavement impatiently from time to time with the toe of her neat boot.

Some one in that long line riveted her attention, but there were hundreds there, and the veil prevented any one from seeing which striped one it was.

The prisoners all turned away their heads as they passed the woman. Was it a prison rule that prompted this, or a sense of shame that has survived hardening crime? Not one did otherwise. Many faces flushed, and if any one in that line recognized the trim figure and graceful pose of the strange woman he could never be detected by the flush, for flushed faces were too numerous.

When the last man of the last line, a negro on crutches, who killed a policeman on Wall street, had disappeared in the door, the woman was escorted out by the keeper. She thanked Principal Keeper Connaughton for his courtesy, which, to all visitors, men and women, is always the same. Her voice was pleasant, and there were no tears indicated in it. Her manner indicated nothing in particular, and certainly not grief. She was driven away to the station and returned to New York.

This woman's visits occur once every two months. Sometimes the interval between them is longer, and sometimes, but seldom, she misses one.

She has been coming for nearly three years, and her visits are always at the same hour. She sees all the prisoners in their lockstep march, and no one connected with the prison knows her name. No one in the prison has ever seen her face.

There are two ways of accounting for the periodical visits of this mysterious unknown. She either loves or hates, with a greater love or a greater hate than ordinary, some one of the Sing Sing convicts. Perhaps it is love that impels her to remain veiled and thus to spare the object of her affections humiliation and shame. Unrequited love perhaps leads her to conceal her face. Possibly her hate of some one in that long line of erring men derives a certain pleasure from the sight of him in the moment of his disgrace.

Who can tell why she hides her face? Is it because of love or hate?—New York World.

The "De" and the "Van."

In Britain the presence or absence of the prefix de never was a criterion of nobility, and in early times it was not such in France. Even in later times many of the noblest families of that kingdom never used it. Louis XIV, however, in 1699 forbade the use of the prefix to all who were not noble by race.

In Holland van or vander is no sign of nobility. Dr. Burnett deprecates in strong terms the frequent practice in modern times of prefixing De to certain surnames, and the extensive introduction of that particle, from mistaken motives, into peerage titles. He might, on similar grounds, have condemned the affectation of spelling certain names with ff, which is of course only a form of the capital.—Scottish Review.

The postal authorities are discussing the momentous question: Is the report of the Breckinridge-Pollard suit too obscene to be sent through the mails? We think it is, and the railroads should refuse to carry Breckinridge for the same reason.—Post.

The Ogden Press says that the Pullman Palace Car Co. have issued a circular about the number of years their conductors and porters have served them, and in the future all conductors who have served five years will receive a gold band to wear on his coat, and every five years after that he will receive on; and after ten years the company will furnish him two suits a year in appreciation of his faithful services. The porters will be served the same, except that they will receive a silver card. The object is to show the company's appreciation of faithful duty and to enable the people to distinguish the old employes from the new.

The Louisville Courier-Journal in an editorial of May 6th declares that Breckinridge should be beaten for renomination. The paper says: "The situation in Ashland district is unprecedented and makes it imperative that every journal which has the good of the party at heart, which cherishes the honor of its State and which appreciates its obligation to society, shall protest with all its power against the re-election to Congress of Colonel W. C. P. Breckinridge. We do not underrate what he has done for his party and the cause of tariff reform in the past. But if his ability for future usefulness were not destroyed by the miserable scandal which has darkened his name the party could not afford to accept his services at the price it would be forced to pay. It is idle to attempt to obscure the issue with sophistical distinction between Colonel Breckinridge's public and private life. It has gone far beyond the possibility of that. The question simply is do the people of Kentucky propose to send as a representative to Congress the man whom Colonel Breckinridge confessed himself to be in his testimony before a Washington jury? It is a question which transcends the limits of the Ashland district of Kentucky itself. It is a question which the people of the entire nation are deeply interested in. The part of his speech yesterday devoted to the scandal in which he figured were better passed over in pity. It is a strange exhibition of marvelous effrontery, wretched taste and mentally and morally oblique casuistry."

The day before the recent battle in the Third Ohio district, the Boston Traveller had an editorial article upon it, as follows: "The surface issue is the election of the congressman in the Third Ohio district, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Congressman Houk. The return of a Democratic or Republican representative to the present congress is of trivial concern in itself, but greatly important and significant as a typical exhibit of the judgment of the nation upon the Democratic policy and programme. In this Ohio district the issue is confessedly drawn with the utmost sharpness and clearness. The contest turns distinctly and solely on the tariff, or more precisely, on the Wilson bill programme. In all the documents that have been sent out by the Democratic campaign committee, as a correspondent of the World remarks, the arguments have been for the Wilson bill as it came from the house, income tax and all, with the general deprecation of the senate's delay in making it a law. Rarely, if ever, has a campaign been fought out on both sides with such freedom from personalities and such insistence upon a single issue."

While it has been a Democratic district generally, McKinley carried it by 536 votes last fall, and it seemed to be confidently claimed that there would be even a still more pronounced change in favor of the Republicans. The outcome, however, has been a bitter disappointment to the noisy shouters against tariff revision. Probably the most noteworthy feature of the great victory of Mr. Sorg, the successful candidate of the Democracy, is that he is identified with the manufacturing interests of his district in the closest and most practical way, having earned his first dollar as a journeyman iron-moulder. He has ever been in constant touch with the workingmen and employes, and made a frank and open canvass before the people as an advocate of tariff reform. Truly it was a significant contest.—Los Angeles Times.

DREAMING.

The cooling fingers of the twilight lay
A balm upon the fevered ebb of day,
And, languor lulled by dream winged spirits in their flight
Between the half uncertain hours of dark and light,
I dream of thee.

Trilled through the silvery sphere of fading day,
A late bird homeward winga its wearied way;
And, through the wide tranquillity of upper sea
Attunes his vesper note of faroff minstrelsy
To songs of thee.

Far from the west the sentinel of light
Lets the dead altars of approaching night
Aflame, and paints the ambient skies with mystic gold,
Whose liquid light reflects the happiness of old
Of me with thee.

The sky, the air, the sea, the earth, its flowers,
Lie steeped in magic of the moonlit showers,
And I? Far out beyond the waves, where sky meets sea,
From star to star across the night's tranquillity,
I come to thee.

The evening winds, distilled from fragrant flowers,
Pour out their incense on the dew wrapt hours,
And on the still, sweet harmony of sky and sea
I stray a little space into infinity
To dwell with thee.

Thus when the fingers of the twilight gray
Pour balm upon the ebbing tides of day,
I, languor lulled by dream winged spirits in their flight
Between the half uncertain hours of dark and light,
Can live with thee.

Kilgore's Objections.

A single phrase has made Colonel Kilgore a national character. Very early in his congressional career he began to say, "I object." He has kept this up at every session of congress with serene consistency. A small man, a nervous man or a bad tempered man could never have made a success of such a policy. He would have been run over in some way. But Colonel Kilgore's "I object," uttered with dignity and with deliberation and backed by such an impressive personality, has won its way. It has stopped hundreds of little bills; it has sent many a disappointed member to the cloakroom fuming and swearing. And yet the big man, who is always good humored and who smiles on slight provocation, is a popular member of congress. There is everything in the way that "I object" is said. The tone can carry malice or anger or honest opposition. Colonel Kilgore says "I object" with such utter disregard of personal considerations and with such unfailing regularity that he has disarmed the resentment which usually falls upon objectors.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Smelling Out Bank Bills.

If a bill must be sent in a letter, the safest plan is to roll it tightly into the shape of a lamplighter and lay it in the fold of the sheet inclosed. Arranged in that fashion, the fact that it is money cannot well be distinguished by the "feel." A thread, with a knot at the end, will not be so likely to fetch a telltale fragment of the fiber paper when drawn by means of a needle through the envelope, and the smell of it will be less perceptible. So peculiar is the effluvium belonging to bank or treasury notes that experts at the bureau of engraving say that they can distinguish them when sealed in envelopes by the nose every time. A thief once showed to government detectives who had caught him that he could pick out, while blindfolded, from a pile of 400 letters every one of seven which contained paper cash merely by scent.—Washington Star.

Tollemache's Consideration.

Of the late Lord Tollemache's consideration for others an amusing instance has been related by his brother. One day, at Peckforton, he came down earlier than was his wont and happened to look into the drawing room. He found the room "not done" and littered with brushes and dusters. Extremely displeased he rang the bell impetuously, and the inculpated housemaid was summoned, but when she appeared, instead of administering the intended rebuke, he apologized to her for coming into the room so early, and was so full of excuses for his untimely visit that she said at last, "Pray, don't mention it, my lord."—London Tit-Bits.

Malta Drinking Water.

"The best water I ever drank," writes a correspondent, "was at Malta, where it is collected on the flat roofs, which are most carefully cleaned preparatory to the heavy fall of rain which takes place when the weather breaks the first or second week in September. Every house has below it an immense tank, often of the same area as the house, and about 12 feet deep, and into this pours the beautiful fresh water, which comes up cool and sparkling when wanted."

Scared Enough to Dye.

"See here," said the man who had married a widow, "hasn't your hair turned gray rather suddenly since we were wed?"

"Oh," said she, "that's from fright. I was so scared when you proposed to me, don't you know!"—Indianapolis Journal.

The strongest animals in the world are those that live on a vegetable diet, say the vegetarians. The lion is ferocious rather than strong. The bull, horse, reindeer, elephant and antelope, all conspicuous for strength and endurance, choose a vegetable diet.

When you speak of bees, designate the kind referred to. There are 4,500 species popularly known as "wild bees," 3,200 being natives of the Americas. Britain has 70 species of bees and 16 of wasps. Of the latter there are 170 species known to entomologists.

In the Vatican library there is a treatise on dragons, a manuscript in a single roll 300 feet long and a foot wide, the material of which is said to be the "tanned gut of a great dragon."

A woman wearing stays as loosely as is possible for such articles to be worn exerts a pressure of 40 pounds on the organs which they compress. Such figures in cold print are startling.

GENESIS OF THE STEAMBOAT.

Ancient Craft That Foreshadowed the Modern Greyhounds of the Sea.

The first steamboat was built by Dennis Papin, who navigated it safely down the Fulda as long ago as 1707. Unfortunately this pioneer craft was destroyed by jealous sailors, and even the very memory of it was lost for three-quarters of a century. In 1775 Perrier, another Frenchman, built an experimental steam vessel at Paris. Eight years later, in 1783, Jouffroy took up the idea that had been evolved by Papin and Perrier and built a steamer, which did good service for some time on the Saone.

The first American to attempt to apply steam to navigation was John Fitch, a Connecticut mechanic, who made his initial experiments in the year 1785. To what extent Fitch was indebted to the three illustrious French inventors named above we are not informed, but that his models were original there is not the least doubt. In the first he employed a large pipe kettle for generating the steam, the motive power being side paddles worked after the fashion of oars on a common rowboat. In the second Fitch craft the same mode of propulsion was adopted with the exception that the paddles were made to imitate a revolving wheel and were fixed to the stern—clearly foreshadowing the present sternwheeler.

This last mentioned boat was the first American steam vessel that can be pronounced a success. It made its first trip to Burlington in July, 1788. But, after all, it was not until after the opening of the present century that steam navigation started into actual life. In 1807 Robert Fulton (who every school child knows was an American), in conjunction with one Robert R. Livingston, built the Clermont, and established a regular packet service between New York and Albany.

The success of this undertaking was so satisfactory that four new boats were built before the end of 1811, at least two of them being designed for service in other rivers.—St. Louis Republic.

The Man In the Iron Mask.

A letter to Louvois by Louis XIV, written in cipher, has been long in the archives of the ministry of war and has at length been deciphered. In it the king orders Louvois to arrest General de Burlonde for having raised the siege of Conti without permission, to send him to Pignerol and to conceal his features under a loup, or black velvet mask. The order was executed, and the presumption is therefore violent that the "Man In the Iron Mask"—it was a black velvet one with iron springs—was General de Burlonde. The story tallies with the known fact that the prisoner made repeated attempts to communicate his name to soldiers; that he was treated with respect by his military jailers, and that Louis XV, who knew the truth of the whole affair, declared it to be a matter of no importance. The difficulty is to discover the king's motive for such a precaution, but he may have feared discontent among his great officers or the soldiery. It must, however, be possible to discover from the lists in the war office whether General de Burlonde was recorded as "missing" or "dead" about the right time.—Saturday Review.

Tricks In All Trades.

The young doctor was sitting in his consultation room chatting with a friend when some one entered the outer office. He stepped out, and the friend heard him say:

"Pray take a seat. I'll be at liberty in a few minutes."

Then he came back into the consultation room and closed the door after him.

"I'll skip," said the friend.

"Not for the world. Sit down," said the doctor.

"But you have a patient waiting."

"Well, it's a woman. Let her wait about 15 minutes."

"You may lose her business."

"On the contrary, I'll get it regularly. I always make them wait."

"Why?"

"To give the impression of a rush of business. It is the only way to keep a woman. If she thought I wasn't rushed to death, she'd lose confidence in me and go somewhere else."—Chicago Record.

A Cabman's Revenge.

A good story is told of a stipendiary magistrate in a Yorkshire town, not given to err on the side of leniency, who heavily fined a cabman for fast driving. A few days after the magistrate, detained rather longer than usual in the court, was hurrying along to catch his train when, seeing an empty cab handy, he hailed the driver and directed him to proceed to the station, telling him that he was pressed for time. The driver, however, heedless of the hint, kept to a gentle trot. "I say, I say, my man," exclaimed the fare, with his head out of the window, "drive faster than this!" "It can't be done, sir," replied the driver. "Ye see, if we drives faster we're had up afore the 'beak,' and we gets fined, so we has to be careful." He did not alter his pace, and neither did the "beak" catch his train.—London Tit-Bits.

Women Usurers.

Women are, as we know, invading most trades and professions, but it is interesting, says the London Lady, and not a little startling to learn that they have even taken to the doubtful one of usury. "You would hardly credit," said a well known solicitor recently, "what a huge number of women money lenders there are about." Many of them have small private connections only, obliging feminine friends or acquaintances pressed for the amount of some dressmaker's or milliner's bill with temporary loans at interest. But there are others who go in for it extensively—advertise, and, in fact, make quite a handsome income out of it.

I SHALL NOT DIE FOR THEE.

For thee I shall not die,
Woman high of fame and name;
Foolish men thou mayest slay,
I and they are not the same.

Why should I expire
For the fire of an eye,
Slender waist or swanlike limb?
Is't for them that I should die?

The round breasts, the fresh skin,
Cheeks crimson, hair so long and rich:
Indeed, indeed, I shall not die,
Please God, not I, for any such.

The golden hair, the forehead thin,
The chaste mien, the gracious ease,
The rounded heel, the languid tone—
Fools alone find death from these.

Thy sharp wit, thy perfect calm,
Thy thin palm, like the sea foam;
Thy white neck, thy blue eye,
I shall not die for these alone.

Woman, graceful as the swan,
A wise man did nurture me;
Little palm, white neck, bright eye,
I shall not die for ye.

An Old Family.

Several years ago there was an old family in Pennsylvania named Roth. Indeed the long line of Roths was about all the family had to show by way of distinction, and so much did they make of the long branches of the family tree and the Niagara of blue blood that had in centuries past coursed through their veins that people of the more recent generations really began to think these Roths were of some account.

One evening there happened to be a party in the little town of M——, and beside the great Roth family the guests numbered among others young Dr. Sharp. He was a popular and rising physician and considered by matchmaking mammas a particularly desirable catch.

Mrs. Roth had four marriageable daughters, so at the first favorable opportunity she cornered the young doctor and sought to impress upon him the importance of her wonderful family.

"Why, doctor," she said, "we all came over on the Mayflower, so I know you will not think me bold in asserting that the Roths are really one of the first families."

"Pardon me," replied the young physician, "but I have no hesitation in saying that your family enjoys even a greater distinction."

"Oh, doctor," gushed the old woman, giving herself a congratulatory hug on her coming triumph. "Indeed you flatter us."

"Not at all," he replied, "for I know you are the first family."

"Who told you that, dear doctor?"

"The Bible," he replied reverently, "for it says the Lord was Roth."—Boston Budget.

Count D'Orsay and Lady Holland.

A story going the rounds is one told of the famous Count d'Orsay. On the occasion of his first visit to England, while he was very young, very handsome and not easily disconcerted, he chanced to be seated at dinner next to the brilliant and singular Lady Holland.

That remarkable and many sided woman was in, as it happened, one of her imperious humors, and her young neighbor soon felt its weight. She dropped her napkin. The count picked it up gallantly. Then her fan, then her fork, then her glass, and as often her neighbor stooped and restored the lost article. At last, however, the patience of the youth gave way, and on her dropping her napkin again he turned and called one of the footmen behind him. "Put my plate on the floor," said he. "I will finish my dinner there. It will be so much more convenient to my Lady Holland."—New York Times.

Growth of the Human Heart.

Dr. Benecke of Marburg has made known his observations on the growth of the human heart, the fact appearing that the increase is greatest and most rapid during the first and second years of life, its bulk at the end of the second year being exactly double what it originally was. Between the second and seventh years it is again doubled in size. A slower rate of growth then sets in and continues during the period of maturity of other portions of the body. After the fifteenth year up to the fiftieth the annual growth of the heart is about .061 of a cubic inch, the increase ceasing about the fiftieth year.—Leisure Moments.

Royal Pin Money.

The Princess of Wales' long retirement has enabled her to save much of her pin money—£10,000 a year—and bring it up to a comfortable amount. In the past Alexandra has had plenty to do with that allowance, dressing herself most elegantly, her daughters very much less so, and fitting out the boys. Times have changed, her children have an annual income of £36,000 to divide among themselves, and the princess has lived aloof from London society since the death of her eldest son, thereby incurring but little expense for dress.—New York Advertiser.

"Neither is a dictionary a bad book to read," says Emerson in his essay on books. "There is no cant in it, no excess of explanation, and it is full of suggestion—the raw material of possible poems and histories. Nothing is wanting but a little shuffling, sorting, ligature and cartilage."

THE TERRIBLE FATE WHICH BEFEL THE CENTRAL AMERICA.

A Contest Between Angry Waters and a Bucket Line, In Which the Latter Lost. A Cowardly Engineer—A Bird Guided the Ellen to the Rescue.

And who that remembers can hear without a thrill the name of the steamship Central America, which sank in a great storm on Sept. 12, 1857, with most of her officers and crew, nearly 400 passengers and $1,800,000 in gold?

The Central America was crowded with treasure laden people from California on their way to New York. After leaving Havana on Sept. 8 she ran into a storm. The steamer began to leak, and Captain Hernden called upon the passengers to form lines and pass the buckets. Hour after hour the tempest howled, and the huge vessel groaned as the immense seas broke against her. Hour after hour the men with the buckets toiled for their lives; slowly the water gained on them.

The officers exhorted the bucket gangs not to pause for a moment if the ship was to be saved. The wind roared and the storm increased in fury. Every passenger stuck to his post and worked until he fell to the deck exhausted. Then the women offered to take the places of their wornout, fainting husbands and brothers, but none of the men would allow it. As the horror of the situation gradually dawned on the minds of the women and children the air was filled with sounds of terror, but above the raging hurricane and the cries of lamentation rose the chorus of the bucket men:

Heave, oh! heave, oh! stamp and go,
We'll be jolly blather, oh!

All day long they sang this song and fought for life against the steadily rising water. Mrs. Easton, a bride on her honeymoon trip, passed bottles of wine to the heroic men to strengthen them in their desperate work. All night long the struggle was continued, and still the ocean gained inch by inch. The women begged, with tears in their eyes, to be allowed to help. They cheered the brave fellows and wept when they saw them fall to the deck with white faces and trembling limbs.

During the next day the peril of the steamer was increased by the lack of food and water. The hurricane tossed the sinking hull about and shattered her spars and masts. While the tired and sleepless men stuck to the buckets the women knelt and prayed to God for assistance.

About 2 o'clock in the afternoon a sail was seen to windward. Guns were fired and signals of distress hoisted. The strange vessel, which turned out to be the brig Marine of Boston, answered the signals and tried to approach, but the gale blew her about three miles away.

Then the boats were made ready, and the women and children prepared themselves. They had to strip off nearly all of their clothes and put on life preservers. Many of the women had gold, which they could not carry with them. Two of them went to their staterooms and took out bags of $20 gold pieces, which they threw down in the cabin, inviting the others to take what they pleased. The money rolled and jingled about on the floor, while the two weeping women explained that they were returning home to enjoy the fortune which they had made in California, and that they would be beggars if the ship was lost. None of the women dared to take more than two pieces of gold lest it might weigh them down.

The men still remained at their work, saying that they would remain on board until another ship arrived, as the Marine could not take all the passengers, and the women and children must be saved first. Among those heroes was Billy Birch, the famous minstrel.

Two of the lifeboats were smashed by the sea, but three boats were filled with women and children, many of the latter being infants. The last boat to leave carried the chief engineer. He solemnly promised the captain to return, but the moment he got into the boat he drew a knife and threatened to kill any one who followed him. Later on, when the women and children were put on board the Marine, the chief engineer, like the coward and liar he was, refused to return.

Now the sinking steamship was so low in the ocean that almost every wave swept her deck. Some of the passengers got into the rigging, while others tried to build a raft. Night came on. The storm continued to rage. The ship quivered and careened. Rockets soared up into the bellowing, angry heavens. Slowly the vessel filled with water, and the doomed host clinging to her deck and rigging prepared for death. There was no weeping and no shrieking, no wringing of hands. The captain stood at the wheel to the last.

All at once the ship, as if in an agony of death herself, made a plunge at an angle of 45 degrees, and with an appalling shriek from the engulfed mass she disappeared, and nearly 500 human beings were left struggling among the fierce waters. The scene was horrifying, and many who were saved afterward fainted at the mere memory of it.

A few held on to planks and spars all through the wild night, and as the day broke the Norwegian bark Ellen arrived and picked up 49 of the men.

"I was forced out of my course just before I met you," said the captain of the Ellen to the rescued passengers, "and when I altered my course a bird flew across the ship once or twice, and then darted into my face. A few minutes later the bird repeated its movements. I thought it an extraordinary thing, and while thinking on it in this way the mysterious bird reappeared, and for the third time flew into my face. This induced me to alter my course back to the original one, and in a short time I heard noises in the sea and discovered that I was in the midst of shipwrecked people."

Who shall say what power guided the flight of the frail messenger through the stormy air?—New York Herald.

Waiting to Be Called.

The solicitor of a mountain district of North Carolina a few years back was J. M. Gudger. On one occasion five colored men of unusual blackness of tint were on trial. When the case was called, the judge, noticing the group, inquired, "What have you now, Mr. Solicitor?" Instantly came the reply, "A flush of spades, your honor."—San Francisco Argonaut.

Quite a large number of people are coming into Inyo county from the southern part of the State, with a view of purchasing or locating land and permanently residing here. They all seem to well pleased with the outlook for our well-watered valley, and speak very highly of the future possibilities of our much favored county.

ATTEMPT TO MURDER.

MANUEL MONTANA DANGEROUSLY WOUNDED.

Last night about 11 o'clock, in the town of Bishop, Manuel Montana, of Lone Pine, was shot and dangerously wounded by a Mexican named Balentin Diaz.

It seems that Montana had known Diaz in Los Angeles some years ago, and in speaking of him, stated that at that time he did not bear an enviable reputation. Diaz hearing of the remarks became angry and sought an explanation. Meeting Montana they talked it over, had a drink, parted, and were apparently on friendly terms.

Later in the evening, about 11 o'clock, Montana, thinking that perhaps Diaz might be in need of something to eat and a night's lodging, went in search of him for the purpose of providing him with both. Meeting him, and before he could extend his invitation, Diaz commenced shooting and shot the unfortunate man three times, in the stomach, head and left hand.

The would-be murderer, after the shooting, stole a horse and started down the valley. He was tracked as far as Independence by Frank Rielas, from whom we gained the above information.

Sheriff Gorman and deputies are now in pursuit, and it is confidently expected that Diaz will be in custody in a short time.

The injured man is reported to be still alive as we go to press.

Foster's Forecast

Fosters's last bulletin give forecast of the storm wave to cross the continent from May 9 to the 13th, and the next will reach the Pacific Coast about May 13th, cross the western mountains by the close of the 15th, the great central valleys from the 16th to the 18th, the Eastern States about the 19th.

May is usually a quiet weather month, but this year it will assume the role of March, and much blustery weather will be experienced. This storm wave will continue this unusual weather, and a larger number of electrical disturbances than usual may be expected. This disturbance will also inaugurate the cooler half of the month, the temperature of which will average about as much below the normal as the first half will have averaged above.

The warm wave will cross the western mountains about the 14th, the great central valleys about the 16th, and the Eastern States about the 18th.

The cool wave will cross the western mountains about the 17th, and the great central valleys about the 19th and the Eastern States about the 21.

Sutro Tunnel History.

The Sutro tunnel connection with the underground workings of the Comstock mines was made on Monday, July 8, 1878. The connection was made on the 1640 level of the Savage incline shaft. A bulkhead was put in to prevent the flow of water through the tunnel until a drain was cut to carry off the waste. The drain was cut that Summer, three feet deep and three in bread h in which a flume was placed constructed of three-inch redwood planks. It required four months to complete this drain, which is four miles in length. The connection of the tunnel with the Comstock mines was celebrated in the town of Sutro on July 9. The employes were entertained at a banquet on the evening of that date and at the conclusion of his address on that occasion, Mr. Sutro said he was not prepared to furnish the necessary amount of liquid refreshments at the mansion, but had arranged with the saloons in the town to provide everybody with stimulating irrigants at his expense.—Enterprise.

Deserve Praise.

Miss Lena Thomson and Miss Annie Bell deserve great credit for their untiring efforts in procuring subscriptions and the work accomplished at the cemetery at Camp Independence. The fences have all been repaired and the grounds have been beautified to such an extent that they are hardly recognizable. Although the money secured was not enough to pay for the improvements made, yet, lack of funds did not prevent the young ladies from accomplishing their laudable undertaking of thoroughly beautifying the city of the dead. People who have relatives or friends buried there should see that the young ladies are repaid the extra expense they have been forced to incur.

To Grow White Sage.

An experiment is being made in sowing white sage on arid lands. This sage is one of the most nutritious plants known for range cattle to graze upon. One peculiarity of its growth is that where found in its native state there is scarcely a vestige of common sagebrush on the same tract, although the area including the white sage is fringed with common sage.

Independence on Top.

A game of baseball was played in Independence on Sunday last for a purse of $71, between the Independence nine and the Piute nine of Big Pine. Independence winning by a score of 17 to 12, with one inning to spare.

Assignment.

Ardizzi & Olcese, the prominent merchants and sheep men of Sumner, Kern county, have made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors.

The Homer Index says that the Indians say that the Summer will be hot and dry, basing the prediction upon the fact that chipmonks' tails are longer and bushier than usual, enabling the cunning little rodents to better shield themselves from the sun.

R. H. McDonald, Jr., vice president of the Pacific Bank, has been indicted by the Grand Jury of San Francisco for felony, and now lies in a cell in the County Jail. Judge Hebbard fixed his bonds at $100,000.

Irv. H. Mulholland is taking in the Midwinter Fair. He will return to Independence on Wednesday next.

The butterflies are making butter, the grasshoppers are making grass, the chipmonks are chipping, and the frogs are making a terrible racket. Summer has come.—Homer Index.

Fred. Skinner, who has been clerking in a store at Mojave, returned to his home at Georges Creek on Wednesday. He will take a vacation for a couple of months before resuming his labors at Mojave.

CAUTION.

My wife, Maud B. Day, having left my bed and board without any cause whatever, and against my consent, I will not be responsible for any debts she may contract from and after this date.

A Cheap Power,

And at the same time a reliable power, are the points to be sought for in purchasing an engine. With steam power a constant watch on the gauge is necessary to prevent accidents, and the expense for engineer is a serious item against economy. The gas or gasoline engine is by far the cheapest power, as it will run all day without attention or fear of accident, and the cost is about two cents per hour for fuel per horse power. For intermittent power the economy of gas over steam is beyond comparison. While these points of superiority are without question, it is important in selecting an engine to get the best; the best in the long run is the cheapest. Do not fail to investigate the striking advantages of the Hercules Gas and Gasoline Engines. Send for catalogue. If you want second-hand engines of other makes at cheap rates we can supply you. We have a number taken in trade and cannot take any more until they are realized on. PALMER & REY TYPE FOUNDRY, 405-407 Sansome Street, San Francisco.

A Pacific Ocean Basin.

Submarine soundings, which have recently been made with extraordinary care and precision, rendered practicable by means of superior instruments in hands most experienced and expert, show the existence in the Pacific of a trough or basin of extraordinary depth and extent along the east coast of Japan and the Kurile islands, and under the Kuro Siwo, or Japan or black stream, the basin exceeding any similar depression yet found in any other region of the great ocean.

In a run of 30 miles after leaving the coast of Japan, the surveying officers for the proposed transpacific telegraph cable found that the waters deepened more than 1,800 fathoms, and upon the next cast of the lead the wire broke after some 4,643 fathoms had been run out without bottom having been reached. The depth of the deepest cast, which was 5¼ miles, being the deepest water yet found, is remarked as sufficient to hold two mountains as high as Japan's great Fusiyama, one on top of the other, and then the summit of the highest would be nearly two-thirds of a mile under water.—New York Sun.

Exhibit of the Hamburg-American Packet Co., A. W. Myer, General Agent, 101 California Street.

There are very few visitors at the Manufactures' Building, in Midwinter Fair, that have not noticed in the German section the exhibit of the Hamburg American Packet Co. in the shape of a beautiful model of the famous steamer "Furst Bismark." In fact there are crowds around it all the time. The model was built in Stetting, Germany, by the Vulcan Shipbuilding Co., the firm who built the steamer "Furst Bismark" at a cost of nearly 300,000 marks. This model illustrates the first great point made by the company, namely, safety in crossing the ocean, and their four great ocean racers were built with that in view. The magnificent twin-screw express steamers "Augusta Victoria," "Columbia," "Furst Bismark," and "Normania," of 13,56,000 horse power are counted among the finest, largest and fastest ships afloat. The dimensions of the "Furst Bismark" are 521 feet length, 57 width, 34 depth, burthen 12,00 tons, engines 16,000 horse-power. Steamers as generally constructed have one set of machinery, shaft and screw, but these new vessels have their whole working machinery duplicated and no expense has been spared to make these ships as safe as human foresight can secure. They are practically unsinkable, being divided by a longitudinal bulkhead into two non-communicating halves, each fully equipped with a full set of machinery, shaft and screw, capable of propelling the ship at a high rate of speed. Each side is again subdivided into seven water-tight non-communicating compartments. This is the great principle of the twin screw system. The steamers also have a double bottom, divided into water-tight chambers.

Cut showing twin screw system on Hamburg-American steamers.

Cut showing single screw system.

These steamers must be counted among the fastest ships afloat, the line holding the record for the fastest time between New York South Hampton (London) and the Continent. The best time accomplished on the Southampton route was 6 days, 10 hours and 45 minutes, equal to 5 days, 19 hours from New York to Queenstown, Southampton being about 200 miles east from Queenstown. The best average for the whole trip was over 20 knots, or 23 statute miles per hour.

These steamers have large, luxurious saloons, ladies' boudoirs, music and smoking rooms, and the staterooms are fitted up in magnificent style. The method of ventilation is perfect, and there is first-class service throughout, with the conveniences of barber shop, bath and toilet rooms, etc. In fact the accommodations are such as may be obtained in a first-class hotel. There is no overcrowding, the number of passengers being limited to the seating capacity of the saloons. The motto of the Hamburg-American Packet Company is "Safety, Speed and Comfort," and it is carried out to perfection.

At the office of A. W. Myer, the general agent, at 401 California St., San Francisco, tickets can be had for the through to Europe, including railroad trip to New York. An Overland Ticket Office is conducted in connection with the steamship and foreign banking departments. Those who have relatives or friends in the old country can pay for their through passage from any place in Europe to any place in this country, also can remit their money in large or small payments through the agency of Mr. A. W. Myer, 401 California Street, San Francisco.

Better Than He Expected.

Boston has the reputation of being a city of unusual culture. No doubt this reputation is deserved; but Bostonians do not, as the humorous paragraphers so frequently intimate, converse in the street in Greek or conduct their business affairs in Latin. This was just the impression, however, which a visitor to the modern Athens recently received.

He was from one of the mountain districts of the south and was visiting Boston for the first time. He strolled about the city, taking in its sights, getting lost in its winding streets and thoroughly enjoying himself.

He was walking, shortly after his arrival, along the lower part of Washington street, when the old statehouse, nestling so demurely among its neighbors, attracted his attention. He did not know that he was standing before one of the oldest and most historic buildings in America.

Situated as it is in the busy part of a business street, he took it simply for a store of some kind, differing from those about it only in being far less pretentious. In fact, he did not notice the building itself so much as the words that stood out in large gilt letters across its front.

This inscription, which was very properly placed on the venerable building some years ago, is the motto of the state. It shows at once the spirit of liberty that dominated our forefathers, and the troublous times through which the young republic had to pass before its independence was secured. It reads, "Ense petit placidam sub libertate quietem."

The stranger gazed at the mysterious words for some time, spelling them out forward and backward, but utterly failed to extract any meaning from them. Finally he called to a newsboy who was hurrying by. "Say, bub, what's that say up there."

"Why," said the boy, "that's Latin."

"Well," replied the southerner, a look of admiration overspreading his face. "I've heard a pile, first and last, about the edjucation of this 'ere town, but I 'low I never reckoned as how they painted their signs in the dead languages."—Youth's Companion.

A Memorable Square Meal.

"If a man is blessed with a good appetite," said Mr. Staybolt, "he can get along comfortably for quite a spell without terrapin; there may be times, indeed, when he will find the delights of a banquet in a very simple meal. I remember a day in the army, for instance, when, after we had been for weeks without fresh vegetables of any sort, there was issued to the regiment a ration of potatoes. It so happened that on the same day the sutler had onions. There were in our tent four men. We got the company cook to give us our rations of potatoes and of salt pork uncooked, and we bought onions of the sutler. We had at that time an old saucepan that one of us had picked up somewhere. We got out the saucepan, and cut up the pork and boiled it until it was about half done. Then we put in the onions and then the potatoes, which we had cut up in large pieces as nearly as possible uniform in size, so that they would all be done at the same time.

"While one man looked after the fire another attended to the cooking. The other two sat on the ground and applauded—that is, they sniffed the air whenever the lid was taken off the saucepan and looked at each other and at the two men by the fire and smiled.

"When the stew was nearly done we put in a few hardtack to soften, and when after a formal inspection by each man it had been officially declared done the cook lifted the saucepan from the fire and set it on the ground. The two men who had the least to do had been holding their plates and spoons for fifteen minutes.

"Good? It makes me laugh whenever I think of it."—New York Sun.

Arsenic Eaters.

The majority of the fashionable beauties of Sydney, according to an English observer, have peculiarly delicate complexions, languid expressions, fragile physiques and a die away look in the eyes, which are more suited to the enervated temperament of an old civilization than the active vitality of a new world. It was easy even for a novice to detect that these ladies owed a good deal to their perruquier. The mystery of this curious combination of premature baldness and unusual delicacy of complexion was explained by the fact that these women ate arsenic in order to produce an aristocratic pallor and languor and found to their horror that another effect of the drug was to make their hair drop out. Valuing their complexions above their hair, however, they sacrificed the one to the other. What a woman will endure for her complexion may be estimated by this, and also by the fact that these arsenic eaters rarely live past 45.—San Francisco Argonaut.

A Vicious Fish.

In South America there is a small fish that not only attacks its fellows of the sea and river, but is greatly dreaded by the natives, who during certain seasons have to ford the streams in which the carbitos are found. Bathers are often attacked by them, the sharp, chisel shaped teeth taking a bit from the flesh wherever they attack. They are perfect scavengers, eating the animals that float down the river—dead or alive.

ONLY GIRL AT OVERLOOK

By FRANKLIN FYLES.

[Copyright. All rights reserved.]

CHAPTER I.

He seized Ravelli by the throat.

Two names were used for the only girl at Overlook. In addressing her the men of the place always said "Miss Warriner." In mentioning her they often said "Mary Mite." The reason for this distinctive difference was revealed by the sight of Miss Mary Warriner herself as she sat on a high stool behind a rude desk, under a roughly boarded shelter, and with rapid fingers clicked the key of a telegraphic instrument. There was a perfect poise of quiet self possession which would have been very impressive dignity in an older and bigger person, and which, although here limited by eighteen years and one hundred pounds, still made a demand for respectful treatment. Therefore the men when in her presence never felt like calling her anything else than "Miss Warriner." If she had been less like a stately damsel in miniature, and more like such a child as she was in size only; if her employment had been something not so near to science as that of telegraphy, and not so far off from juvenile simplicity; if her brown hair had been loosely curled instead of closely coiled, and if her skirts had stopped at her ankles instead of reaching to her feet, then she might have been nicknamed "Mary Mite" within her own hearing, as she was beyond it by those who described her smallness in a sobriquet. There may have been a variance of opinion among those dwellers at Overlook who had made any estimate of her composure, but if there was one who believed that she merely assumed a reserve of manner because she was among two hundred men he had not yet tried his chances of exceptional acquaintance.

Overlook was crude and temporary. The inhabitants were making a roadbed for a new railway at a spot where the job was extraordinary, requiring an uncommonly large proportion of brain to brawn in the work. Those who were mental laborers in the remarkable feat of engineering, or were at least bosses of the physical toil, were the ones who had errands at the telegraphic shed, and for whom Mary sent and received messages over the wires. The isolated colony of workers was a hundred miles deep, in a wilderness of mountain and forest, but not as many seconds distant, measured by the time necessary for electrical communication from the construction company's headquarters in a great city.

"Must you wait for an answer?" Mary said, as she clicked the last word of a message. "It's an hour since your first telegram went, and they seem in no hurry to reply."

Polite indifference, and nothing else, was in her clear, gentle voice. There was neither boldness nor shyness in the eyes that opened wide and blue as she lifted them from the paper to the man whom she questioned. There was no more of a smile than of a pout on the mouth that worded that inquiry. She did not indicate the faintest interest as to whether he went or staid, although she did suggest that he might as well go.

"I'd rather lounge here, if you don't mind," was Gerald Heath's answer.

Here the alertness of the placid girl was faintly shown by a quick glance, but it was so furtive that the subject of her wariness did not know his face was being scrutinized, and she was quickly convinced that she was not the cause of his remaining, for he said, "I'll tell you why I'm anxious about the telegram and in a hurry to get it."

Gerald Heath had been lazily leaning against the makeshift desk of the telegrapher as he waited, and for pastime had whittled the smooth birch sapling that formed its outer edge. He had chipped and shaved after the manner of those to whom a sharp pocket knife and a piece of wood provide a solace. There had been no conversation except a few words concerning the message. But now he heightened himself to six feet by standing erect, and took on the outlines of a magnificent physique. His proportions had not been realized before by the girl at the other side of the counter. She comprehended, too, that if his somewhat unkempt condition were changed to one which included a face cleaned of stubborn beard, a suit of modish clothes to replace the half worn corduroys, and the shine of a silk hat and polished boots at his now dusty extremities, he would become a young gentleman whose disregard might be an appreciable slight.

That was the conclusion which she reached without any visible sign that her careless eyes were conveying any sort of impression to her mind. As it was, he looked an unusually burly specimen of the men to whom isolation from city life had imparted an aspect of barbarians. Before he had uttered another word she realized that he was wholly engrossed in the matter of his telegrams and had no thought of the individuality of the listener. Not only was she not the thing that made him wait, but she might as well have been old, ugly or a man, if only she had ears to hear.

It was a summer afternoon, and the clear, balmy weather was seasonable. The removal of protective canvas had left the structure an open shed, over the front of which hung the boughs of the two trees against whose massive trunks it leaned. Gerald Heath reached up with both hands and held the foliage aside.

"Do you get an unobstructed view?" he asked. "Now, I've helped lay out railroads through many a place where it was a shame to let trains go faster than a mile a day. I've surveyed routes that ought to provide special trains for passengers with eyes in their heads—trains with speed graduated between sixty miles an hour and sixty hours a mile. It is an outrage on nature and art that travelers should ever be whisked past Overlook without a good chance to see what we're looking at. That's why I wrote to the president of the company a month ago telling him how a slight deviation from the surveyed line would enable passengers to get what's in our view now. He asked how much the line would be lengthened by my plan. A hundred yards, I answered. And I submitted a map showing how the tracks, after coming out from the tunnel, might make a small detour to this very spot instead of going behind a mass of rocks that will completely hide this"—and a comprehensive gesture of one arm followed his sweep of vision.

Places that get their names on impulse are apt to have appropriate ones. Camps of railway makers in a hitherto unbroken country are not often miscalled. An ensuing town on the same site may be unmeaningly named as a permanency, but the inspirations that afford transient nomenclature are usually descriptive. It was so in the case of Overlook. The railway tunneled through the mountain and emerged at a height of a thousand feet above a wide valley. Mary had daily, and all day long, sat overlooking the prospect.

It had astonished and enchanted her at first, but familiarity had blunted the keenness of her appreciation. As shown to her anew it was like a fresh disclosure. Gerald Heath stood holding the boughs aside which otherwise obscured a part of the view. He appeared to feel that if he was not the painter of this enormous landscape he, at least, had the proprietary interest of a discoverer, and it was with something of the air of an art collector proudly extolling his choicest possession that he turned his eyes from it to Mary Warriner. The expression of admiration on her face, although quiet and delicate, was quite satisfactory, for a moment only, and then the delight passed out of her visage, as though expelled by some physical pang. It was the suddenness of the change, for it was of itself very slight, that made it perceptible. Gerald instinctively turned to look for the cause.

Into the picture had come a human figure. A few yards in front of the hut stood a man. In relation to the landscape far beyond he was gigantic, and the shade of the trees made him devilishy black by contrast with the sunlight of heaven that illumined the rest. He was thus for an instant in silhouette, and it chanced that his sharp outlines included a facial profile, with the points of a mustache and beard, giving satanic suggestion to an accidental attitude of malicious intrusion. The illusion was almost startling, but it was momentary, and then the form became the commonplace one of Tonio Ravelli, who walked under the shelter.

"Do—a I centrude?" he asked, with an Italian accent and an Italian bearing. "I suppose no—eh? Thece ces a placa bees ness?"

Mary's small departure from a businesslike, perfunctory manner ended at once. She took the scrap of paper which Ravelli laid on her desk, and without a word translated its writing into telegraphic clicks. Ravelli was a sub-contractor, and this was one of his frequent communications with officials at the company's city office. The response was likely to be immediate, and he waited for it.

"To get the full value of this view," Gerald Heath resumed, and now he addressed himself to Mary directly, as though with almost a purpose of ignoring Ravelli, to whose greeting he had barely responded, "you need to come upon it suddenly—as I once did. We had been for months blasting and digging through the mountain. Every day's duty in that hole was like a spell of imprisonment in a dark, damp dungeon. And your men, Ravelli, looked like a chain gang of convicts."

"You woulda no dare say so mooch to theira fa-ces," Ravelli retorted, with an insolence that was unmistakably intentional.

"Oh, I didn't mean a reflection on them," said Gerald, disregarding the other's quarrelsome aggressiveness. "We all look rascally in the mud, drip and grime of tunnel work. And your gang of swarthy Italians are bound to have a demoniac aspect under ground."

Taking Photographs Under Water.

It is quite possible to take photographs under water. In 1883 a submarine observatory was constructed by Signor Toselli at Naples, enabling visitors to see the bottom of the sea. It was a steel chamber with plate glass floors and a collapsing float to sink it to different depths. It carried eight persons and was illuminated inside by electric light, while telephones communicated with the shore. It was of course quite possible to take photographs inside it beneath the water.—Spare Moments.

ATHLETES.

One and all bear witness to ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS as invaluable for their purposes.

James Robinson the athletic trainer at Princeton College, Princeton, N. J., says:

"I have found it imperative to have pure and simple remedies on hand in case of cuts, bruises, strains, sprains, colds, rheumatism, etc. Shortly after entering upon my profession, I discovered such a remedy in ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. I tried other plasters, but found them too harsh and irritating. ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS give almost instantaneous relief, and their strengthening power is remarkable. In cases of weak back put two plasters on the small of the back and in a short time you will be capable of quite severe exercise. In 'sprint,' and "distance" races and jumping, the muscles or tendons in the legs and feet sometimes weaken. This can invariably be relieved by cutting the plaster in narrow strips, so as to give free motion, and applying on muscles affected."

BRANDRETH'S PILLS rectify the secretions.

Some people imagine that they cannot have a walk-over without trampling their rivals under foot.

The fitness of things is happily illustrated in the name of Chinook Whiskers of Oregon.

AN AUBURN MIRACLE.

AN ACT OF HEROISM IS FOLLOWED BY DIRE RESULTS.

Edward Donnelly Saves a Life Almost at the Cost of His Own—After Years of Suffering He is Restored to Health—His Story as told to a Reporter of the Auburn Bulletin.

[Auburn N. Y. Bulletin.]

It is on record that upon a chilly April day, a few years ago, an eight-year-old-boy fell into the East river at the foot of East Eighth street, New York, and when all efforts to rescue him had failed, Edward Donnelly, at risk of his own life, plunged into the water and, when himself nearly exhausted, saved the boy from drowning. It was a humane and self-sacrificing deed, and received deserved commendation in all the newspapers.

There is a sequel to this accident, however, which thus far has not been published. It is to the effect that Donnelly was paralyzed as a result of the cold plunge and came near dying. Auburn people have known the family since his wife was Amanda Grantman and his sister Mrs. S. D. Corry, of 21 Moravia street. Donnelly himself describes the rescue and the result:—

"I was general foreman of the F. A. Mulgrew Saw Mills, foot of Eighth street, N. Y., on the East river. It was on the 20th of April, 1889, that the boy fell into the river and I rescued him from drowning. At that time I was in the water so long that I was taken with a deathly chill, and soon became so stiffened up and weak that I could neither work nor walk. For some time I was under treatment of Dr. George McDonald, who said I had Locomotor Ataxia. He finally gave me up, and on the 1st of June, 1892, my wife and I came up to Auburn.

"When the disease first came upon me the numbness began in my heels, and soon the whole of both my feet became affected. There was a cold feeling across the small of my back and downwards, and a sense of soreness and a tight pressure on the chest. The numbness gradually extended up both legs and into the lower part of my body. I felt that death was creeping up to my vitals. I was still taking the medicine ('It was Iodide of Potassium,' said his wife), and was being rubbed and having plasters put all over my body, but with no benefit.

"I sent to the Chas. H. Sagar Company, the popular Auburn druggists and chemists, at 109 and 111 Genesee street, and got three boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and began taking them. In three weeks' time I was so improved that from being helpless, I was able to help myself and to get up and go to work, and to walk every day from No. 74 Walnut street, where I then lived, to Osborne's New Twine Factory, Seymour and Cottage streets—more than a mile—where I was then employed, but all the while I was taking Pink Pills.

"Then Dr. Patchen, of Wisconsin, uncle of my wife, and who was here on a visit, began to poo-hoo at me for taking Pink Pills, and finally persuaded me to stop taking them and let him treat me. When he returned to the West he left a prescription with Dr. Hyatt, of Auburn, who also treated me. But their treatment did me no good, and after a while the old trouble returned and I was getting bad again. Then I began to take Pink Pills; have taken them ever since, am taking them now; have taken in all nearly 20 boxes at an entire cost of less than $10.00 (my other treatment cost me a pile of money), and again I am well and able to work.

"If I was able, I would at my own expense, publish the virtues of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to the whole world and especially in New York City, where I am much better known than I am here."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People without doubt mark the beginning of a more healthful era. They were first compounded by an eminent practitioner, and used as a prescription for many years in general practice with almost incredible success. They are now given to the public as an unfailing blood builder and nerve restorer, curing all forms of weakness arising from a watery condition of the blood or shattered nerves, two fruitful causes of almost every ill that flesh is heir to. These pills are also a specific for the troubles peculiar to females, such as suppressions, all forms of weakness, chronic constipation, bearing down pains, etc., and in the case of men will give speedy relief and effect a permanent cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork or excesses of whatever nature. The pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent post paid on receipt of price (50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50—they are never sold in bulk or by the 100) by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.,

A MOTHER'S OPINION.

Mrs. L. A. Lyford, Proprietress of "The Hollywood" 116 Turk street, San Francisco, says: "I am absolutely amazed at the great good Calderwood's Rheumatism Cure did my daughter Fannie. She was afflicted in her feet and ankles with inflammatory rheumatism and had to use crutches to get about. My family physician treated her for several weeks but the girl grew worse and so I sent $5 to the office of Calderwood's Rheumatism Cure, on the corner of Market and Fourth streets, and soon a messenger came back with three bottles of the remedy which she began using, and before the medicine was gone she had thrown away her crutches and is now sound and well.

THE COMPLEXION OF A CHINESE

Is not yellower than that of an unfortunate individual whose liver complaint has assumed the chronic form. The eyeballs of the sufferer assume a saffron hue, there is dull pain in the region of the organ affected, the tongue is coated, breath sour, sick headaches usually but not always occur, and there is sometimes dizziness on arising from a sitting posture. Constipation and dyspepsia are also attendants of this very common ailment, always in its aggravated form, liable to breed abscesses of the liver, which are very dangerous. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters wholly eradicates it, as well as the troubles complicated with it and which it originates. In chills and fever, a complaint which always yields to the Bitters, the liver is seriously involved. This fine alterative tonic removes costiveness and indigestion, rheumatic, nervous and kidney trouble and debility.

At some period in her life nearly every married woman has thought seriously of leaving her husband.

M. W. SCOTT, Esq., of the U. S. She was so out of heart, she returned the answer that it would be like all the rest—of no good; but on my account, she said she would try it, so I got one bottle each; and before she had used half of a bottle she felt that it was benefiting her, and she has continued to improve ever since, and now thinks it the most wonderful remedy on earth for her sex, and recommends it to all suffering females. She has not been so well in ten years.

OUR BABY BOY

Perfectly Cured of Impure Blood by Hood's Sarsaparilla

"Our little baby boy is now almost two years old. When he was about six weeks old there appeared a breaking out on his head and breast. A doctor said it was scrofula, but his treatment failed, and we called upon three other physicians, who termed it salt rheum or eczema. Even then he grew worse. A crust would gather on his head as thick as a quarter and puff up with corruption. Then it would come off, taking the hair with it. About three months ago we resolved to try Hood's Sarsaparilla and Hood's Olive Ointment. To day we are happy to say that Burtron is now

"It is hame, and it's hame,
And it is hame I fain would be."

Oh, for the sight of a manzanita,
With its branches red and its frosty sheen!
Oh, for the shade of a dark madrone,
With waxy blossoms its leaves between!

Oh, for the sight of a white Sierra,
Or undulant wave of a rolling plain!
Oh, for one view of the broad Pacific,
Or the rounded hills of the low coast chain!

Oh, for one breath of the balmy pine breeze

Oh, for the cool of the fog at evening,
Nestling down like a brooding dove!

Oh, for one hour beside the ocean,

Oh, for a place on calm Lone mountain,

OLIVE HARPER.

POOR MRS. PENRHYN.

It was the height of the season—that is, it was becoming more and more difficult to secure a second piece of pie. The table at Lawton's had never been what you would call generous, and the elderly people, to whom no amount of tennis or dog cart could compensate for any lack in dinner, were grumbling perceptibly. Old Mr. Foxwood indeed was heard to mutter one afternoon that he had serious thoughts of going down to the city merely to get a regular dinner, and when asked where he should expect to find it murmured testily that there were places where they had to square the circle, and knew how to give you a square meal if you paid them a round sum.

"I'm going back to Kiasko in September," he added. "It was terribly hot there in July, and I hadn't a particle of appetite; but they set a splendid table."

"Can't expect everything anywhere, Mr. Foxwood," remarked Van Etten cheerfully. "Here you have an appetite and at Kiasko you had something to eat."

To which Miss Deblois added a grim comment to the effect that it might be a good thing occasionally for a high liver to be obliged to diet for awhile.

"Yes, Mr. Foxwood," said Van Etten blithely, "much better di-et than die eating."

"Don't think so. If I knew smoking would shorten my life ten years, I'd go on smoking and die earlier."

"But it is such a pity," murmured Miss Deblois, "for men to be a slave to anything, even to tea."

"Is that the reason why you never take any, Miss Deblois? Then it seems to me you are a kind of slave, too; you are a slave to not taking tea. And speaking of tea, what is the matter with this coffee?"

"It's the cup," said Masterson Flower plaintively. "I should as soon think of trying to drink over a stone wall."

"No, it's the way it is browned. The goodness of coffee is all a matter of browning. Anybody can make good coffee after it is browned carefully."

"Yes," sighed Van Etten. "Such a pity the Browning clubs don't take up this practical branch of their art."

But the young people were perfectly satisfied. There was tennis. There were lovely woods, with drives and walks through them. Occasionally some youth would complain of a too devoted chaperon, who insisted on accompanying the pair through the woods, and effectually preventing any conversation except about the scenery; but he was always assured by Van Etten that it was a good sign when a chaperon took such interest in the "prospects." A small "park" had been laid out with great exactness and very green sodding in front of the house, so that invalids could take their constitutionals comfortably within range; but the landlord feared he had made a mistake when—the park being a perfect square—the worst of the invalids complained that he knew he was losing strength, because when he came he could walk quite around the entire square, but lately, as soon as he got half around, he had to turn and come back.

However, the young people who were not invalids were in ecstacies. There were picnics and excursions and walking parties and moonlight drives, when Mr. Foxwood, surveying the start from the piazza and gazing at the bright young faces, would remark cynically, "Good heavens! one would think you were starting out on a party of pleasure!" The natives of the vicinity offered unique entertainment in the local color of their speech and opinions. It was seldom that an excursion returned without some bonnots from a rustic to carry back for a dinner anecdote during the city winter. It was thought Van Etten had secured rather the cream of these, when he came across a native stonecutter whose direct business was the making of gravestones. He had gravely assured Van Etten that he thought of changing his profession and going to the city. "The trouble with monements," he explained, "is that yer can't never secure any one man fur a regerlar customer!"

Yes, the young people were happy. For there were piazzas and dancing and college songs, in addition to the woods and the tennis; and then there was Arthur Penrhyn.

Arthur Penrhyn was young, he was handsome, he was rich, he was aristocratic, he was devoted. True, he was also married; but his wife had left in July to take care of a sick friend in the city, and Mr. Penrhyn, in her absence, did not mope. Moreover, he had a dogcart. "Yes, it was rather a nice affair," he used to confess with pride; "I'm not too proud to go without a dogcart, but I am too proud to have a shabby one." And he never drove out alone; some one was always invited to share the drive. Moreover, he was a capital tennis player, a good talker, a rather remarkable musician and a thoroughly fine fellow. In other words he was, in summer hotel parlance, "ready for anything."

There were those, including Miss Deblois, who thought he was too ready, and that if poor Mrs. Penrhyn knew, she would shorten her ministrations to her invalid friend. Nothing more definite was ever brought up against him than that he seemed to be "carrying on." He was not guilty of pronounced devotion to any one of the fair belles. Each had her turn in the dogcart, and there came a day when Miss Deblois herself was subjected to a painful decision between maintaining a just consistency and going to drive with Mr. Penrhyn herself.

After much reflection she decided that the long, quiet drive would give her an excellent opportunity to sow good seed in Mrs. Penrhyn's absence. So she went—and sowed, but the only harvest she reaped was a second invitation when her turn came around again, after a goodly number of pretty girls had been content to go to drive without sowing. What she sowed was not known; and it was probably the imperceptibility of any particular harvest that led her to accept the second invitation to herself, and so apparently to encourage the delightful Arthur in "carrying on."

"Is your wife coming today?" she asked primly at the breakfast table one morning, when a date that she had heard mentioned had come around with the whirligig of time.

"Alas, no!" and Miss Deblois was thankful that at least the cheerful Arthur had the grace to suspend an animated conversation with Miss Howe and sigh. "She finds she must stay another week, and she has sent for another of her dresses. I found the skirt, but I am in despair about the waist; I can't find it anywhere, and she is in a great hurry for it."

"Oh, well," said Van Etten, "if she is in a hurry, just pack up the skirt and send it off in haste. Haste, you know, always brings waist."

When the second date that had been fixed for Mrs. Penryhn's arrival came around, however, it was announced that she was really to arrive. Miss Deblois noticed with pleasure—at least she said it was with pleasure—that at any rate Mr. Penrhyn gave up a game of tennis to go in the dogcart himself to the station to meet his wife. Poor thing! How little she knew! It was to be hoped he would at least have the grace to cease "carrying on" in her very presence.

"And so pretty!" sighed Miss Deblois, as she peeked through the blind when the dogcart drove up, and caught a glimpse of a lovely little lady habited most stylishly in dark blue cloth with a very becoming hat and dark blue feathers, who smiled brightly as she glanced up at the house as if conscious what might be lurking behind closed blinds. "How could he desert her so?"

In strict truth it was Mrs. Penrhyn who might have been said to desert Mr. Penrhyn under the circumstances. But Miss Deblois never recognized circumstances. If his wife had to be away it was Mr. Penrhyn's duty to mope. And he had not moped. Moped, indeed!

As the Penrhyns came out on the piazza a few minutes before tea, Mr. Penrhyn introduced his wife to occasional groups, and especially to Miss Howe.

"And are you the Miss Howe who plays tennis so splendidly?" asked Mrs. Penrhyn, with a cordial smile.

"Poor thing! she knows," murmured Miss Deblois. "Who could have told her?"

"Perhaps he told her himself," remarked Van Etten grimly. "You know there was always a letter every day."

"From her, yes," answered Miss Deblois, pursing up her lips.

"But people don't go on persistently writing letters unless they are answered, do they?"

"Devoted wives do, frequently," said the lady, with an emphasis as of one who had been a devoted wife for years.

It was soon evident that, whoever might be the guilty informant, Mrs. Penrhyn "knew all," as Miss Deblois would have expressed it. Every name was evidently familiar to her, and she knew just what incidents were connected with every name. It was Miss Howe who played tennis so well, and Miss Newton who sang so many German songs, and Miss Lewis who had made Arthur that charming smoking cap, and Miss de Peyster who had found those beautiful ferns in the drive through the woods, and Mrs. Malcolm who had shown her husband that lovely view from a remote hill, and Miss Deblois herself who played whist so well that Arthur had been beguiled into playing long after midnight. They must have a rubber that very evening. It was evident that she knew all.

But she had her revenge. The devotion of Mr. Penrhyn to the crowd was nothing to the devotion now of the crowd to Mrs. Penrhyn. They might pity her while she was away, but when she was present she worked her own sweet will. No plans were made without consulting her, no entertainment was complete without her presence. One touch of her hand on the piano, and around it would gather old men, young men, collegians, professors, married men, widowers and bachelors, to say nothing of the troop of bright young girls who admired her as only young girls can admire.

And if Mr. Penrhyn had never concentrated his devotion upon, however unpardonable the amount of devotion he scattered generally, Mrs. Penrhyn, if she wanted revenge, had all she could attend to in the single hearted devotion of her greatest admirer. For there was one gentleman who seemed aware of little but Mrs. Penrhyn's presence. It was he who walked with her, drove with her, talked with her, listened to her, played for her on the piano, with her in tennis and against her at whist. If it were a solitary drive, she was the solitary lady who took it, and if it were a party, she it was who made up the party and decided what other ladies were to go. No other young married lady had ever "carried on" so before at Lawton's. It was he who suggested her shawl, went for the shawl, wrapped it around her shoulders, read to her, promenaded the piazza with her, took long strolls with her.

"She can't be promising to be a sister to him, of course," remarked Van Etten as the two came up the walk one day. "Looks very much as if she were promising to be a widow to him."

Nor did the attraction wear out in the least. It lasted till the very last moment, when Mrs. Penrhyn's trunks were all packed, and when her admirer drove her to the station and actually went with her to the city on the same train!

For this ardent admirer of Mrs. Penrhyn was Mr. Penrhyn, her husband.—Alice Willington Rollins in Pittsburg Bulletin.

Putting Off an Objection.

It has twice happened to me that some one has risen up in the church for the purpose of forbidding the banns. I asked the objector to speak to me in the vestry after service, and the incident passed off and seemed to make little stir in the church at the time, but on both occasions the fact was widely reported in the London papers.

I have heard again of a clergyman who was so awkward that on the first occasion of his officiating at a wedding he stood the whole time at the altar, and read the service exactly as he found it in the prayer book, without inserting the names of the interested parties, "I, M., take thee, N., to my wedded wife," etc.—Cornhill Magazine.

Took No Chances.

Aunt Mary—I know one sign that's never failed yet—if you can slice an apple in two without cutting a seed you will marry the one you wish.

Sweet Girl (ten minutes later)—I've done it! I've done it!

Aunt Mary—Did you use a sharp knife?

Sweet Girl—Of course not. I used a paper cutter.—Good News.

THE UNEXPECTED.

Something That Very Often Happens to Upset Our Plans.

VERY FREQUENTLY IT IS DEATH.

A Vague Dread That Fills the Mind With Anticipation, Is the Result of the Unexpected.

Certain things are absolutely sure to come to us, the heavily laden sons of men. Among them are death, taxes, sorrow and the unexpected. Anticipation is a phantasmagoric and unstable kind of thing, and fulfillment as often cheats the dread as it disappoints the hope of that which had to arrive, for the unexpected is always there on the horizon, sometimes building rainbow bridges against the clouds, and anon tearing up the vineyards on the sunny slopes of an unknown volcano. Though its form is as obscure as that of a ghost in the twilight, the advent of the unexpected ranks as one of the absolute certainties of the future—one of the eternal verities of life.

From the angels unawares whom you entertain under the appearance of doubtful travelers tramping wearily through foreign cities, to the assassin in the garb of a monk, the pickpocket smiling benignly as a sister, the unexpected dogs your steps and meets you full face across the stile. The friend on whose life you had counted with such certainty as to make him the guardian and trustee for your children drops dead as a stone, without note or warning or word of preface; and the life on which you would have laid long odds as compared with your own goes out like a farthing rushlight in a breeze. The last news you heard of that dear woman she was lying at the point of death surrounded by weeping relations and sorrowing friends. In an incredibly short space of time you received her wedding cards, and the expected funeral is exchanged for the unexpected marriage.

Set high on the gilded pinnacle of apparent prosperity, suddenly the painted cheat dissolves, and that which looked so like the real thing melts away into the dim region of the fallacious, the specious, the unexpected. You would as soon have expected the bankruptcy of that fine old lady who issues her promises to pay in Threadneedle street as the collapse of this local Crœsus. But the adage holds good here as elsewhere, and the unexpected is the only thing of which you can make sure.

Unexpected, too, is that transformation of the turtledove into the hawk. Hitherto you have known only the sweetness of docility, the gentleness of patience, the peace of love. Suddenly, almost without cause, and certainly without any show of gradual decline, of practical change logically to be accounted for by physiological conditions, the charmer whom you thought you had charmed throws off the mask and ceases to dance to your piping. The dove ruffles out into the hawk and the law of the unexpected is vindicated.

This is not an uncommon experience when marriage has loosened the bonds of self control necessitated by uncertainty of holding—when intimacy has removed the gloss of formality and shown the real grain underneath. Then the unexpected makes itself manifest, and things undreamed of and unsuspected come to the light, even as those wriggling, round and creeping creatures found under the stone when turned up and set in a new place.

In the matter of arrivals the unexpected is the rule. You think you have safely landed your rolling stone on a distant shore. Foreign tides are to wash over him, and strange influences are to clothe him with fertile moss and maybe radiant flowers. A millstone around your neck here, he is to be there shaped and polished into the goodly cornerstone of a stately temple raised and dedicated to prosperity. You are happy in his fair prospects and relieved by his absence. He had been to you as yet naught but pain and distress—now he is to bring you honor and content. You are looking for a letter from him to tell you of his success. His last spoke hopefully, and the skies were cloudless and serene.

Suddenly, without warning, without even a telegram from the docks, your rolling stone comes tumbling back on to your path. He walks cheerily into your room undismayed by the chance of a cold reception, undeterred by the knowledge of his own failure. Smiling, confident, serene as those skies which arched above him when he last wrote, he greets you with his happy-go-lucky kind of manner—all your good work undone, all your hopes slaughtered like the innocents of old and the whole Penelope web unraveled, having to be redone, no matter at what cost of flesh and patience!

How often the unexpected stultifies anticipation! To bet on the favorite for the Derby is not a more "chancy" kind of thing than to make sure that fulfillment will follow on anticipation. You go for a day's pleasure—something to which you have been looking forward for many days, and for which you have been promised all manner of delights. The unexpected arises in the shape of a furious bore, invited at the last moment, or haply in that of your mortal enemy, or, yet more disastrously, in the form of an accident which turns the rose wreaths of pleasure into the funeral wreaths of mourning and robs the earth of one of her fairest flowers. No one anticipated this terrible overturn of the boat—this fatal plunge of the rash leaders down hill—this broken pole—this defective rein.

Unexpected, unlooked for death swept by that gay throng and the song was hushed in sobs, the smile was lost in tears. Less tragic, but as unlooked for, was the evil temper of your hostess, which spoiled the pleasure of your visit and transformed your expected couch of roses into a cushion stuffed full of pins and needles. You sat on that cushion for the whole time your visit lasted. You walked among burning plowshares and danced over and around eggshells of the most fragile kind. Your anticipated pleasure vanished into thin air, and the most unexpected displeasure brooding like so much sooty fog took its place instead. That, too, comes into the list of a life's experiences more often than is desirable.—London Queen.

CHRISTIANITY AND ISLAM.

In Their Origin Both Religions Are Asiatic and Both Semitic.

In their origin, Christianity and Islam are both Asiatic, both Semitic, and Jerusalem is but a few hundred miles from Mecca. In regard to the number of their adherents, both have steadily increased from the beginning to the present day. After 1,900 years, Christianity numbers 400,000,000, and Islam, after 1,300 years, 200,000,000; but Mohammedanism has been practically confined to Asia and Africa, while Christianity has been the religion of Europe and the new world, and politically it rules now over all the world except China and Turkey.

Mohammedanism has been identified with a stationary civilization, and Christianity with a progressive one. There was a time—from the eighth century to the thirteenth—when science and philosphy flourished at Bagdad and Cordova under Moslem rule, while darkness reigned in Europe. But Renan has shown that this brilliant period was neither Arabic nor Mohammedan in its spirit or origin, and although his statements may admit of some modification it is certain that, however brilliant while it lasted, this period has left no trace in the Moslem faith, unless it be in the philosophical basis of Mohammedan law, while Christianity has led the way in the progress of modern civilization.

Both of these are positive religions. Each claims to rest upon a divine revelation which is in its nature final and unchangeable; yet the one is stationary and the other progressive. The one is based upon what it believes to be divine commands and the other upon divine principles—just the difference that there is between the law of Sinai and the law of love, the ten commandments and the two. The ten are specific and unchangeable; the two admit of ever new and progressive application.—Contemporary Review.

A Crank Recipe.

Thanks are due to a South Side gentleman for his discovery and prompt application of a scheme for abating the crank nuisance. The device is one which, if put into general use, will greatly discourage the practice of going about with a pistol and ordering other people to write large checks. The crank in the present case having made his reasonable request for an immediate donation of $10,000, the proprietor of the house promptly refused. Then the crank drew his pistol.

At this point there comes into play the unpatented crank discouraging device, consisting of (a) smashing forearm blow, knocking the pistol out of the crank's hand; (b) a twisting grasp on the collar; (c) an energetic dragging movement toward the front door, followed by (d) a vigorous muscular exertion imparting a forward and rotary motion to the crank, who thus rolls into the street; the whole performance supplemented (e) by notifying the police.—Chicago Record.

A Monkey's Dread of Snakes.

Of snakes, large or small, our monkey has always stood in abject terror. If he is held firmly and the snake is placed near him, he looks piteously in the face of his keeper, and sometimes, more in sorrow than in anger, he will bite if he is not let go. At one time a snake in a paper bag was shown him. When the paper bag was afterward left near him, he would furtively approach and open it, to peep a moment shiveringly into its depths, and then retreat ignominiously, only to approach for another peep when he had summoned sufficient courage.

A live salamander was placed on the table by his side. This he looked at with a great deal of interest, finally taking it in his hands, with many precautions. When he saw how inert it was, he laid it down and lost all interest in it.—Popular Science Monthly.

An Ancient Arrowhead.

While walking along the beach at Upper Nyack, not far from Hook mountain, Master Charles Meissner picked up one of the prettiest specimens of an Indian arrowhead that has ever been found in these parts. It is of pure white quartz, perfectly fashioned, and was doubtless dropped a couple of centuries ago by some redskin who paid a friendly or warlike visit to these parts. The tribes hereabouts, as our local collectors well know, used black flint entirely, and hence the white quartz specimen is rare. This specimen is now at this office and can be seen for a few days by interested parties.—Nyack City and Country.

STUDY OF BIRDS.

A Very Valuable Collection Given to Harvard College.

DIFFERENT METHODS OF MOUNTING.

How Mr. Scott Conceived a Valuable Paper on the Flight of Different Birds at Night.

One of the most valuable additions which has ever been made to the Agassiz Museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge is a collection of 3,000 birds—made by Mr. W. E. D. Scott—from the United States and West Indies. About 100 of these are mounted, the remainder being in the form technically known to naturalists as bird skins—that is, they look simply like dead birds, that can be mounted at any time. Ever since Mr. Scott graduated from Harvard college in 1873 this plan of making an ornithological collection has been the great object of his life, and to give this collection to the Agassiz museum has been his desire, which is now accomplished.

Mr. Scott is, through his writings, one of the best known collectors of birds in the world. He was one of the original members of the Nutal club of Cambridge, and his first paper before that society, entitled "A Partial List of the Summer Birds of Kanawha County," was the first of the series which are now regularly published by the society. His first work, and one that attracted attention in the whole ornithological world, as well as the attention of astronomers, was brought about by what seems now to be a singular coincidence. Happening to be at one time in the observatory connected with Princeton college, he was invited to look through the telescope at the moon. While doing so, he noticed what seemed to be a number of small objects flitting across the luminous disk. He asked what they were and was informed that it was a common occurrence to see these birds flying across the range of the telescope. So common was it, in fact, that the astornomers had paid no attention to the matter, but of course such an occurrence invited the attention of a man the main object of whose life was the observance of every point pertaining to birds and bird life.

He had heard time and again farmers and backwoodsmen speak of the sound of birds flying by night, and here was an actual proof of the fact, as well as a chance to make a mathematical calculation on the subject, for, upon examination of the subject, it was found that, given the focal length of the lens and the other data which the astronomer could furnish, the flight of the birds could be determined with some degree of accuracy. And not only this, but the kind of bird could be determined, because, as every one knows, each bird has its own peculiar method of flight, which could readily be determined against the bright disk of the moon through a telescope.

The final result of this circumstance was a paper upon the subject, which was translated into nearly every modern language, and this method is now known as the "Scott method of determining the flight of birds by night." So highly are Mr. Scott's opinions valued upon matters pertaining to birds that the British museum recently bought a collection made by him, of some 2,500 Florida birds, at his own valuation, and without even seeing the collection.

It was here in Florida that the writer met Mr. Scott, surrounded by his collections and implements for stuffing and keeping the birds. For years Mr. Scott has made as his specialty the study of Florida birds and has been indefatigable in his efforts to make his collection complete. He has now removed them to his home in Pocantico Hills, N. Y. The first point which the visitor notices, on seeing the collection, is the lifelike manner in which the birds are mounted. Instead of the conventional methods always employed heretofore by professional taxidermists, Mr. Scott has brought out the pose of the bird in actual life.

Nearly all collections of birds which have so far been made have been built up upon an absolutely systematic basis. In the collection proposed for Harvard, the birds are to be rendered as lifelike as possible—that is to say, artistic—while at the same time they shall lose nothing of their scientific value. Heretofore the external features of the bird have been shown with the name attached to each specimen, indicating the species. The specimens have been displayed in rows, each one standing on a perch made from turned wood and T shaped, either painted white or else made of hard wood, varnished. Such a method has always limited the position in which the bird could be placed. The visitors to museums have wondered why every bird should be standing in just that particular way, with both feet firmly planted upon the perch, and looking for all the world as if he were one of an army.

This is wholly artificial, and in contradistinction to it birds should be mounted on simple, natural accessories. By such a method the warbler or the wren should be shown naturally balanced upon the swaying twig, and the woodpecker would be clinging to the trunk of a tree; the gull's environment would be a bit of the seashore, artificially represented. So it will be seen that the idea is for each bird to give a glimpse of the environment in which it lives. But these surroundings should always be a subordinate part of the exhibition, allowing the central figure of the specimen to be the conspicuous object.

The second point to bring out in this collection is the effect of physical environment on such species as are now migratory and range uninterruptedly over large geographical areas. This is to be done in connection with and by the aid of diagramatic maps. To illustrate what is meant, the common quail ranges from Massachusetts to Florida and from the eastern coast to Dakota. Sportsmen who kill this bird in different parts of the country have frequently asked if they are different birds and why those found in different parts of the country are smaller or larger, darker or lighter colored, as the case may be, at the different points where they are encountered.

Now, in this collection it is proposed to have a series of quail, specimens of which shall be taken from the different localities mentioned and brought together.—Boston Herald.

FOOLING THE BIRDS.

How They Are Drawn From Their Hiding Places In the Forests.

I have heard young women whistle beautifully, mimicking the songs of the birds, the blackbird and the thrush particularly. They fashioned simple instruments by the fireside, which were easily carried in the pocket, the whole lot of them, with which they mimicked the calls for the various species. If they wished to see whether a stoat, weasel, crow or jay were about, they would place their lips on the back of one hand and squeal horribly, the cries becoming weaker each time, exactly like those of a rabbit caught in a trap or fixed by a stoat or weasel.

Crows, magpies and jays know very well what that cry means. It is as a dinner bell to them, for after the stoat or weasel leaves a rabbit a feathered company come to eat him. As the evening got more dusky the boys would come out in their gardens, which were surrounded by the fir woods, to call the owls to them. They would hiss and snore like the white owl—the barn owl—hoot, click and bark like the wood owl—the brown and tawny owl—and squeak like mice for the pleasure of seeing the owl swoop toward the place where the sound or sounds proceeded from.

"You bide still an see ef I don't fetch him in this ere fir close to our gate," said one to me. I did "bide still," being very much interested in the whole performance. First he locked his hands together with the thumbs upright, and into the hollow of the hands he blew between the thumbs. This was the hooting machine, and it was simply perfect. "Hoo, hoo, hoo, hoo-e, hoo!" rang out, the fourth note being longer than the others. Then followed the click of the bill, as the fine bird snaps it in pleasant anticipation of mouse, finishing up with the bark when the bird springs from his resting place.

All this was done to perfection by the boy, but the master touches were yet to come. With a small piece of twig he rattled "tick, tick, tick, tick, tick," like the short patter of a mouse on dry leaves, for all mice travel intermittingly—there is a short rush and then a halt for a few seconds. No owl was visible yet, but the bird had got close when he heard the rustle. As the lad squeaked as a mouse will when he runs at night, he looked up and pointed. There was the owl ready for his mouse. When the bird caught sight of us, he departed in the same noiseless fashion in which he had arrived.—St. James Budget.

Had Fun With the Policeman.

It is seldom that one of the finest gets such a scare as a member of the force received the other night on Park row in front of the postoffice. This policeman has made himself obnoxious to the newsboys who congregate around the postoffice. He seemed to them to take delight in moving them on. The boys had no redress, but at last they took up a scheme which has afforded pleasure to small boys more than once.

They secured an old pair of trousers, together with a coat and a hat, which they stuffed with straw. Waiting until the policeman was looking in their direction, two of them, with the dummy between them, boldly walked out of Beekman street and started across Park row toward the postoffice. The sight of the two boys in charge of a man who apparently could not take care of himself interested the policeman, and he started to follow them. The boys walked on until they reached the middle of the street, when they threw the figure on the track before an approaching horse car and fled.

With a pale face and an involuntary cry of terror the policeman ran toward the body. He had gone but a few feet when he tripped and fell. The driver of the car put on the brake just as the horses reached the body. Just then two boys rushed from the postoffice, seized the body by the legs, one on each side, and ran down Beekman street with it amid the shouts of their companions, who had been silent but much amused witnesses of the joke. The policeman did not follow.—New York Sun.

Professor Thomson Was Snubbed.

As near to recreation as anything of the kind ever engages the always earnest attention of Professor Elihu Thomson is the interest which he shows in the alleged applications of electricity, particularly in regard to the devices by which the unscrupulous play upon the credulous and the suffering. While at the Chicago fair he examined at a selling stand a so called electrical appliance to be worn in the shoes for the cure of various ailments from cold feet upward. The young woman volubly described the apparatus in political phrase, "claiming everything," and then proceeded to explain the "scientific principles" by which the electric current would pass up one limb to the heart and then down by the other one, and much more of the like ilk. The professor mildly stated that electricity did not operate in the manner stated, when the young woman indignantly swept the goods back into the showcase, exclaiming, "Well, what do you know about electricity anyway?"—Boston Transcript.

In the Neck.

At the sound of approaching footsteps the knight with the black mustache raised his eyes in supplication.

"Guide me," he murmured, "O powers, in this affair of the heart."

He waited with bated breath.

"Certainly," he argued with himself in sudden apprehension, "this is the trysting place."

A shadow flitted past him. A mocking laugh rang in his ears.

"Guyed me," he groaned.

Then he groped his way hence.—Detroit Tribune.

LIFE INSURANCE.

Why a Wife Should Not Insure Her Life in Favor of Her Husband.

MORTALITY AMONG MARRIED WOMEN

It is Believed the Crime of Wife Murder is More Frequent Than is Commonly Supposed.

The subject of life insurance is beginning to attract attention among women. It is known that though the aggregate volume of the sum payable on life policies in Europe and America amounts to the enormous figure of $10,000,000,000—a sum exceeding the total cost of all the railroads in the world added to all the national debts—the risks taken out on female lives amount to a comparatively small sum. This has arisen partly from the unwillingness of life insurance companies to insure women, a feeling which induces some companies to refuse to insure them at all, while others charge 1 per cent. additional for female risks, and partly from the fact that the woman is not, as a rule, the family breadwinner, and her death does not, save in exceptional cases, require to be guarded against in a pecuniary point of view. Still the number of women whose demise would take bread out of the mouths of others is on the increase.

Companies object to take female risks because women are exposed to die of casualties and diseases from which men are exempt. But, on the other hand, men are exposed to die of accidents or of diseases produced by reckless lives quite as frequently as women perish in childbirth or from diseases incident to maternity. The sexes are fairly on an equality in this respect. It is probable that a healthy young woman of twenty, whether married or unmarried, is about as good a risk as a young man of the same age.

Some of the companies raise the point whether any one has an insurable interest in the life of a woman. A man's wife and children have an insurable interest in his life, but who suffers a pecuniary loss when a girl or a married woman dies? Certainly not, as a general rule, the father, or the mother, or the brothers and sisters of the former, or the husband of the latter; they may be plunged into deep affliction, but affliction cannot be measured in dollars.

But the case alters if the girl or the married woman belongs to the working class, so that she is in whole or in part the breadwinner for the household; then her father, mother, brothers, sisters, children, and possibly her husband, may have an interest in her life which can be insured. If she belongs to the leisure class, and does not contribute by her daily exertions to the daily sustenance of her family, it is not easy to see who has an interest in her life which could be appraised in dollars, and for which a company could make compensation in the form of a check.

It is common, when a marriage takes place between young people who have no fortune and expect to be dependent on the husband's exertions, for the man to insure his life in favor of his wife and children. This is one of the most beneficent uses of life insurance. Formerly, more frequently than now, the consorts assured their lives reciprocally, each in favor of the other. This operation never could be reconciled with business principles or sound ethics.

Experience, moreover, has developed the unpleasant fact that the mortality among women whose lives are insured in favor of their husbands is larger than the ordinary mortality tables warrant. It is a terrible thing to say, but doctors and criminal lawyers believe the crime of wife murder to be much more frequent than is commonly supposed. It is a crime that is rarely suspected, and still more rarely detected. A woman is taken ill with a strange pain. She consults a doctor, who knows that women are always having strange pains, and that they generally arise from very simple causes. He prescribes for this or that organic trouble. The pain continues. The woman tries other medicines, which have relieved friends of hers under similar circumstances. The husband acts as nurse and gives the medicines. In these days of science, toxicology knows a dozen drugs which are difficult to detect by smell, taste or sight, but which, if regularly administered, will sap life and eventually cause death.

As a general rule, a girl should refuse to insure her life in favor of her husband, and a well administered company should refuse to issue such a policy.—San Francisco Argonaut.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.
PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, MAY 18 1894

The Clews circular of May 5th is the most hopeful issue of that Wall street hebdomadal we have seen in a long while. Its review of the business condition and prospects in the United States and Europe is cheery throughout, and with the exception of its stock fling at the silver question it looks up on the revival of good times as a fact that is imminent. It says of the European outlook that the large industrial nations are coming out of the severe commercial depression from which they have been suffering since the close of 1890; and that the recovery of England France and Germany is very marked. The change may be expected to show its effects in an increased demand for our exports, and a better tone in the markets for our great staples, as well as an improved inquiry for our investments at a later stage. Speaking of the causes of the long depression and their consequences, it says that these consequences have produced an unprecedented depletion of stock of manufactured products, and so soon as the new tariff is passed, and uncertainty dispelled, there is nothing to prevent a resumption of normal activity in every branch of business, the consequent general employment of labor and an attendant increase in consumption by the masses. This is a more lively and cheerful tune than Clews has been in the habit of playing for, lo, these many months. Let us hope that its prognostics will be speedily realized.—Los Angeles Herald.

The Democrat who is honest in his belief will not hesitate in doing his duty for no better reason than that the party has recently met with reverses. The men who are enjoying the benefits that the tariff bounty affords are not going to surrender those advantages without a struggle. On account of public discontent and depression in business, they are enjoying a temporary triumph, but harmony of action and unity of purpose among those Democrats who have the courage to champion a principle in the face of an apparent adverse public sentiment, will eventually vindicate the wisdom of the Democratic policy of tariff reform. In the face of the emergency that now confronts us, no honest, courageous, conscientious, loyal Democrat can hesitate for one moment about the course he shall pursue. The people may be temporarily deceived with the fallacy that the resultant effect of an unjust system of taxation that is still in force is due to a Democratic administration, but that illusion will disappear if Democrats are but true to themselves and faithful to the trust reposed in them, and before the close of President Cleveland's term of office, we confidently predict that the American people will put the stamp of popular approval upon the acts of his administration.—Woodland Democrat.

The first check upon corporation rule has just been reached in New York state, where Governor Flower has approved a bill to compel the railway companies to pay the costs in all condemnation suits which they begin and fail to prosecute to a termination. The elevated railways in the city of New York have been annoying the property holders in that city with vexatious lawsuits and then dropping them after the owners had been put to an unwarrantable expense. It was to prevent such occurrences as these that the bill in question was passed. Some of these days a similar law will be needed in California.

Europe begins to fear that she is losing her laborers and will shortly resort to some plan of keeping them from coming to this country. This is the most cheering news that we have heard in some time and will save the United States the trouble of erecting barriers at the ports of entry to keep out the labor that Europe worries so much about losing.

It looks as though silver would yet be placed in its proper place beside gold as the money of the civilized world. It is encouraging to see that even the most rabid gold bugs are coming to acknowledge that bimetallism is necessary if the commerce of the world is ever to recover from the present state of paralysis.

The reports from Kentucky differ. One says that Colonel Breckinridge will be elected, the other states that the women will ask him to withdraw. We sincerely regret that the women of Kentucky may not vote.

SPIKING THE GUNS.

"The regiment will be annihilated," observed the adjutant coolly. And then, in the same immovable tones, he asked some one to pass him a biscuit.

"Curse you," shouted the colonel, "do you think I don't know that? Do you imagine I fear getting killed tomorrow? Do you suppose I want to live on after what has happened? It's the eternal disgrace of the thing that's cutting me."

"Once comfortably shot," remarked the senior major in easy philosophy, "it doesn't much matter to me personally where or for why I go down. Not a soul will be left behind to care."

This last remark added tinder to the blaze. The major was a peasant's son, who had hacked and thrust his way up from the ranks by sheer hard fighting. His commanding officer was a noble of the old regime. He had hoped and reasonably expected that the previous day's engagement would give him a brigade, and so the fiasco had fallen all the more bitterly.

It seemed as though the very stars in their courses had been battling against us. Everything had gone wrong. The blame was not ours. But this, in an army where want of luck was the greatest crime, told nothing in our favor. Many men had fallen, and panic had seized the heels of the rest. Which of us initiated the run cannot be said, but in the rush of some all had been carried along, few, except perhaps one or two of the older officers, resisting very strenuously. The colonel, burning with shame, had gone in to report. What precisely had been said to him we did not know, but we guessed with some accuracy, although he did not repeat the details. The gist of his interview was that the regiment was to attack again on the morrow, and if unsuccessful then once more on the day after, and so on till the bridge was taken.

Yesterday the thing had been barely possible. Yet today it was far different. During the night the defenses had been more than trebled. The Austrians swarmed. Enough artillery was mounted there now to have demolished an entire army corps advancing against it from the open.

The deduction was clear. The bravest men will turn tail sometimes, and in our army, which was the bravest in the world, there had during the latter part of the campaign been more than one case of wavering. An example accordingly was to be made. Our corps had been singled out for the condign punishment. We were doomed to march on the morrow to our annihilation.

Of course the matter had not been put so at headquarters. There the words ran: "Most important strategic point. Must be taken at whatever cost. Your regiment will again have the honor, colonel," and so on. But, summed up bluntly, it was neither more nor less than I have said. We all understood the order of the letter, and there was not a man in the regiment who would hesitate a moment in carrying out his share. Each private soldier, each officer would march with firm determination to march then his last. That gives the case in a nutshell.

But the secure knowledge that there would be no skulkers along this road to execution did not pacify the colonel. If anything, it increased his bitterness. It would make his ungrateful memory last the longer. He sat at the table end of that inn room where we had messed, with folded arms and nervous fingers kneading at his muscles. By a singular irony we were lodged in comfort there—we, who had got to go out and die on the morrow—and he must needs taunt us with it, as though it were a shame for such as we to have so tolerable a billet.

Myself, I was stretched out on a sofa away by the far wall, and lay there mutely, having but little taste for the wordy savageries which were being so freely dealt about. And the night grew older without my being disturbed. But the angry man at the end of the table singled me out at last, perhaps because my outward calm and listlessness jarred upon him.

"Tired, Eugene?" he asked.

"A little, sir."

"Ah, I can understand it. I noted your activity today. You have mistaken your vocation, mon cher. You should not have come into the army. You should have been a professional runner."

An answer burned on my tongue. But I kept it there, gave a shrug and said nothing. What use could further wrangling be? But the silence was an ill move. It only angered him further, and he threw at me an insult which was more than human man could endure.

"Do you think you will again feel inclined to use those powers of yours tomorrow, Eugene? Or had I better have you handcuffed to some steady old soldier?"

A dozen of the other officers sprang to their feet at this ghastly taunt, for when such a thing as this was said to one of their number it touched all. The old major was their spokesman.

"Colonel, we make all allowances, but you are going too far with the youngster."

The colonel scowled round tight lipped for a minute, and then:

"I am quite capable of commanding this regiment of lost sheep without unasked for advice from subordinates, major. Lieutenant Ramard, you heard my question, I presume? Please have the civility to answer."

During the minute's respite I had been thinking and acting—that is, writing. I got up and handed the colonel a slip of paper. On it were the words:

I acknowledge that I, E. Ramard, lieutenant of the Twenty-second ——, am a coward.
EUGENE RAMARD.

He read it.

"There, sir," I said, "kindly add the date, as I have forgotten what it is, and please leave that behind with the baggage when we march tomorrow. If I do not do better work for France than any man in the regiment, it is my wish that this paper be published." The colonel nodded grimly and then frowned.

"Have I your permission now, sir, to withdraw from this room?"

A refusal was framing itself—I could see it—but the lowering faces around made him curb his passion, and he nodded again, but reluctantly.

In the dark, wet air outside, and not before, did I realize fully what I had done. The screed on the slip of paper had been the spasm of the instant. It seemed to me now the outcome of a moment's insanity. I had had no plan, no trace of scheme in my head while I was scribbling. The words and the pledge were an empty boast, made in the wild hope that I could hold them good. But how could such a thing be done? The most furious, desperate courage by itself would avail nothing. There would be a thousand men around, each to the full as brave as I—for no one can march farther than death—and to do "better work for France" than any of them! Ah, no, the thing was impossible! With them I should fall, and among all of them I alone would be branded infamous. The paper would be brought to light, the curt, bald confession would be read, with no explanation of how or why it was written, and men would form their own opinions—all hostile, all against me.

To leave behind nothing but the name of a self avowed coward! Oh, agony, bitter agony!

I wandered wherever my blind feet led me, wrenched by torments that God alone knew the strength of, and from which there seemed no human means of escape. The heavy rain squalls moaned down the village streets. The place, with its armed tenantry, slept. Only the dripping sentries were open eyed. These, taking me for an officer on ordinary rounds, saluted with silent respect. No soul interfered with me. Not even a dog barked.

The thought came: You die only to gain a wreath of craven plumes. Why not pass away from here—escape—desert—vanish—be known no more—and yet live? No one withholds from you new life and new country. France alone, of all the world, is utterly hopeless for you.

The thought gained. I say it freely now, for the dead, dull blackness of my prospect then showed no spot of relief. In my walkings to and fro I gradually verged nearer and nearer to the outer cordon. As an officer I knew the words for the night—sign and countersign both. I could pass the pickets.

Farther and farther toward the scattered outskirts of the hamlet did my doubting feet lead me. In one more patrol up and down I think my mind would have been made up, and after that whatever deluge the fates desired. But a sound fell on my ear, faint and not unmusical. I was dully conscious of some new scheme beginning to frame itself. I changed my path and walked faster.

Presently the cause of the sound disclosed itself. A field forge, an anvil and a couple of grimy farriers and half a dozen troopers with horses. The cavalrymen were resting on the ground, watering bridle in hand, awaiting their turns. The smiths were slaving, sweating, swearing, doing the work of thrice their number. It was a queer enough group, and I gazed at it for many minutes, still unable to frame the gauzy idea that had reanimated me. Then one of the farriers who had been fitting a hissing shoe on to a hind hoof chilled the hot iron in a rain puddle and humped up the horse's fetlock on to his apron again.

I started.

The fellow picked up a hammer, took a nail from his mouth and drove the nail first gently, and then smartly home.

"There, vicious one," swore he, "I put that spike through the vent in a matter of seconds, but with these four others beside it, thou'll not rid thyself of it in as many weeks."

I strode forward.

"Five louis for that hammer and a score of nails!"

The military smith dropped the hoof from his lap, came to attention and saluted. But he looked at me queerly and answered nothing. I could see he thought me mad. Very likely excitement had made me look so.

"Ten louis. There is the money in gold."

"My officer, the things are yours."

Steel spikes, brittle rods that would snap off short, would have been better. But time was growing narrow, and I must take what offered. These soft bent nails would serve my purpose. And now for the river. The current was swift, and I could not swim a stroke. I must go up stream and trust to find some tree trunk or wooden balk that would aid me in floating down.

On the matters that happened after this I cannot speak with any minuteness. To think back at the whole time seems like a blurred dream, broken by snatches of dead sleep. I know I gained my point on the river bank, some miles above the village, and entered the water there, finding it chill as ice. I think it was a small fence gate that aided my passage.

I can only recollect clearly that the thing I clung to was terribly unstable, and that on being landed by a chance eddy on a strip of shoal I lay there for fully half an hour, listening to a sentry plodding past and past through the mud 10 yards away, unable to move a limb. Then I gathered strength, and crawling, not only from caution, but through sheer helplessness, made my stealthy way still farther along the shore.

Four batteries commanded the approaches to the bridge. Two were on either flank, to deliver a converging fire; two, one above the other, were in a direct line with it, so that the causeway could be swept from end to end.

It was in the lower of these last that I found myself—by what route come I cannot say. Only then my senses seemed to return to me. I was lying in an embrasure. Overhead was the round black chase of a 60 pounder. I crawled further and looked down the line. Six more guns loomed through the night, making seven in all.

The rain was coming down in torrents, sending up spurts of mud. There were men within a dozen yards, wakeful men, and then, and not before, did it flash upon me that my farrier's hammer was a useless weapon. Fool that I was to bring it. Idiot I must have been to forget that the first clink would awaken the redoubt. My life? No, pah! I didn't count that. But it would mean only one gun spiked effectually, if so much. I drew back into the embrasure and knitted my forehead afresh. The right thought was tardy, but it came. I drew off my boot. It was new and it was heavy—badinage had been poured out by my comrades over its heaviness. The strong sewed heel would drive like a calker's mallet.

Then I got to work. The guns were loaded and primed. The locks were covered with leather aprons. I used infinite caution, crawling like a cat, crouching in deepest shadows, stopping, making detours, not for mere life's sake, be it understood, but because life was wanted for work yet undone.

The seven guns were put out of action, and still the night was dark, and the Austrians were ignorant behind the curtain of rain. And then on to the upper battery. Two, four, eight guns!

Three I spiked, and the night began to gray. Three more, and men were stirring. I got reckless and sprang openly at another. The air was filling with shouts and stinking powder smoke and crashes and the red flash of cannon.

The French were advancing to the storm in the wet, gray dawn. Both flanking batteries, fully manned, had opened upon them, but of the guns which had direct command of the bridge only one spoke.

Into the roar of artillery the wind brought up yells and oaths and bubbling shrieks. And then the eagles came through the smoke. There was no stopping that rush.

Somehow I found myself among comrades, fighting with a claw backed farrier's hammer, knowing nothing of order or reason or how these things came to pass, but heated only by an insane desire to kill and kill and kill! And then I grappled with a man who was struggling off with a flag, and wrestled with him in a crimson slough, and choked him down into it, while heavily shod feet trampled madly on both of us. And afterward there was more shouting and cheering, and mighty hand claps between my shoulder blades, and the old major gave me cognac out of a silver flask—cognac which seemed to have been sadly overwatered.

And that is all I remembered till I woke up in the afternoon from the sofa in that village inn. Reveille had sounded. We mustered under arms, and the roll was called. Many did not answer.

And then, "Stand out, Lieutenant Ramard!" said the colonel.

I advanced and saluted.

"You will consider yourself under arrest, sir, for desertion before the enemy. Presently you will surrender your sword and report yourself at headquarters."

The colonel turned and exchanged some words with a little, pale man near him, who sat awkwardly on a white stallion.

He resumed, "The emperor has considered your case, sir, confirms the arrest and orders you to be reduced to the ranks." The colonel paused and continued:

"But as a reward for your gallantry your commission of captain will be made out with promotion to the first vacant majority, and you will also receive a decoration."

And then I was ordered to advance again, and the emperor transferred a Cross of the Legion from his own breast to mine.

"Captain of the Twenty-second," he said, "thou art my brother."

I never asked for the colonel's apology.—C. J. C. Hayne in Washington News.

Discretion.

Two burglars broke into the house of a merchant who was generally considered to be very rich. After herculean efforts they managed to open the safe, but who can describe their disappointment when they found that it was empty and all their labor in vain? At that moment the master of the house, awakened by the noise, appeared on the scene. For a moment all three stood there as if turned into stone. The merchant was the first to come to himself.

"Gentlemen," he said, "let us all maintain a discreet silence over this incident. And now permit me to show you the door."—Seifenblasen.

Ignorance.

"Brother Johnsing," said Mr. Bones, with a wink at the other end man, "here is a conundrum for you. What is the difference between an oyster and an elephant?"

"H'm!" said the middle man thoughtfully. "The difference between an oyster and an elephant? Well, Mr. Bones, I must confess I don't know."

"Then I should not advise you to go into the oyster business," returned Mr. Bones. "The orchestra will now play 'Ta-ra-ra Rooney.'"—Exchange.

Death Rate of Miners.

Seeing the conditions under which coal miners work in hot and dust laden atmosphere and their terrible liability to fatal accident, it might naturally be expected that their death rate would be excessively high. As a matter of fact, this is far from being the case. Even when fatal accident is included, their death rate is by no means an excessively high one, and putting accidents aside the death rate from disease alone is exceptionally low, being almost exactly the same as agricultural laborers.—National Popular Review.

THE MINE SORCERER.

MALAY FAKIRS WHO WORK THE IGNORANT AND SUPERSTITIOUS.

They Are Not So Potent as They Were Some Years Ago—Ceremonies Observed by the Pawang In Invoking the Hantu, or Tutelary Spirit, of the Mine.

Miners in all countries have been noted for their superstitious beliefs as to various matters affecting their good or ill luck. Soothsayers, sorcerers, or at least lode finders, were in past ages trusted to secure the satisfactory results which are now nowadays more reasonably hoped for on the report of the mining expert and engineer. The latest survival of belief in the occult powers of the "medicine man" or sorcerer is probably to be found in the Malay peninsula, which contains the most important tin workings yet known to exist. The individual who thus guides his employers to fortune, or the reverse, is known as a pawang.

Until the practical termination of independent Malay rule throughout the major portion of the peninsula, about 10 years ago, the pawang was a recognized member of every mining staff, and recognized not only by the mine owners but by the petty chiefs, who alternately encouraged or obstructed mining enterprise.

So potent was he that he could foretell the prospects of a mine, levy fines (which went into his own pocket), direct the offering up of animal sacrifices and enforce rules respecting the workings of a mine which but for him would have been simply ridiculed by the miners. Although in many districts his pretensions are now discredited, he still lingers on, superstition with the existing generation of miners having yet a firm hold in the more remote districts.

The pawang may or may not be the hereditary successor of a predecessor. In some cases he is self made, and attains his position by a few lucky forecasts as to the value of a projected mine. In a territory where, as is sometimes said, "If you dig up the highway, you are sure to find tin," the supernaturally gifted prospector has a tolerably easy task. Not that tin is always found when a hole is sunk. But a moderate acquaintance with the usual indications is quite sufficient. Chinese of limited means do not often trouble a pawang in the initiatory stages. But when the mine—"stream tin," or tin sand, with an overburden of 10 or 20 feet earth and gravel—is fairly started, the pawang suggests that he alone knows how to keep good luck in sight. Sometimes he is politely informed that his services are not wanted, and he leaves in wrath, predicting all sorts of disaster to the unbelieving towkay or manager. Upon the whole, however, he manages to get his way.

A fine physical appearance is indispensable. When engaged in any duty, such as invoking spirits or offering sacrifices, he is allowed to assume only one of two positions—with his hands resting on his hips or with them clasped behind his back. He alone is allowed to wear a black coat in the mine. As in the case of camphor hunters in Formosa and gutta percha hunters in Malaya, he uses a peculiar vocabulary. Thus cats, elephants, tigers, buffaloes, etc., must not be mentioned by their usual designation, nor are such animals (tigers unfortunately sometimes prove unpleasant exceptions) ever allowed upon a mine. Perhaps the oddest article in the pawang's "index expurgatorius" is the lime fruit or lemon, which under no circumstances may be brought to a mine, and should the juice be thrown into the mine water dire results are dreaded. Raw cotton, glass and earthenware or an unsheathed spear or kris are equally anathema, all the articles mentioned being offensive to the hantu or spirits which haunt the mine.

Assuming that the pawang is engaged by a mine owner at a fee varying from £15 to £30, his first business is to erect a platform or altar, constructed of a special kind of wood. The four branches, which serve as supports, have the bark peeled off for about 4½ feet from the ground to where the twigs begin. The leaves on the latter are not removed. A square platform, measuring 15 inches each way, of peeled sticks is fixed to these supports at about three feet from the ground. A foot above this comes a railing round three sides of the platform, while a railed ladder with four rungs reaches from the open side of the platform to the ground. Fringes of cocoanut ornament the railing, and the whole construction is bound together with creepers, rattan, however, being forbidden. Upon it offerings are laid, and the pawang invokes the hantu or tutelary spirit of the mine to bless it with good fortune. A bag of tin sand from the first washing is the fee paid for this service.

Sometimes a cheaper kind of altar is made by placing in the ground a single peeled stick with its upper end split in four, upon which is placed the little platform above described. The next process is to hang an ancha, or square frame, about 18 inches each way in the smelting house just under the eaves of the roof. This serves as an interior altar, upon which the miners place their offerings to the hantu. The accurate hanging up of the ancha is a matter of special care.

These preliminaries accomplished, the mine is considered sure of luck.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Thought He Could Jump.

A young man the other day got an umbrella where the bottle got the cork—in the neck. This young man is one of those fellows who can readily explain to you that nothing that any one else can do is really as difficult as it appears. He joined a local gymnasium not long ago, and after watching the members once or twice going through their exercises came away with the feeling that he was a full fledged athlete. Walking on East Court street alongside of the jail, he espied two women ahead of him walking abreast and carrying a basket of freshly washed clothes between them. The street being narrow at this point, they took up the full width. The young man, being in a hurry, thought he could save time by jumping over the basket, but his calculation was not acute enough, and he kicked some of the wash off. After walking a few steps he turned around to ascertain the result of his maneuver and was just in time to see an umbrella hurled at him by the unerring aim of an enraged woman. He tried to dodge, but was too slow.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

The Origin of Starching.

The course of history carries us back no further than the year 1564 for the origin of starching in London. It was in that year that Mistress Van der Plasse came with her husband from Flanders to the English metropolis "for their greater safety," and there professed herself a starcher. The best housewives of the time were not long in discovering the excellent whiteness of the "Dutch linen," as it was called, and Mistress Plasse soon had plenty of good paying clients. Some of these began to send her ruffs of lawn to starch, which she did so excellently well that it became a saying that if any one sent her a ruff made of a spider's web she would be able to starch it. So greatly did her reputation grow that fashionable dames went to her to learn the art and mystery of starching, for which they gladly paid a premium of £4 or £5, and for the secret of seething starch they paid gladly a farther sum of 20 shillings.—New York World.

A Hair Splitting Bishop.

It is recorded of a certain hair splitting English bishop, who was accustomed to compose his "charges" in the train, and whose desk was always placed opposite to him, that he invariably treated it as though it were a living vis-a-vis. The train being very full on one occasion, a would be passenger inquired if this place was taken, and the bishop, with his sunniest smile, expressed regret that there was no room. "I don't think that was quite right, my lord," said one of his fellow passengers. "What was not right?" inquired his lordship urbanely. "To say that the place was taken." "Pardon me, I did not say that it was taken; I was particularly careful to use the word 'occupied.'"—San Francisco

DIED.

MONTAÑA—At Bishop, May 11th, Manuel Montaña, a native of California, aged 37 years.

Arthur McEwen has discontinued the publication of his Letter.

District Attorney Forbes and F. E. Densmore are Benton on a land case.

P. H. Mack Esq. is expected to arrive home from Los Angeles on Monday.

Mrs. F. Rhine arrived home last Friday from a visit of several weeks at San Francisco.

There was a slight shock of earthquake at Independence early last Sunday morning.

Webb Walker came up from Olancha a few days ago and spent several days in town.

Dana Brown, formerly conductor on the C. and C., is captain of a tugboat on the Sound at Seattle.

General N. P. Chipman will be a candidate for Governor before the Republican State Convention.

The Independence boys defeated the Lone Pine in the baseball game last Sunday by a score of 19 to 8.

A. Cohn of Bishop was a visitor at Independence during the week, returning yesterday morning.

Irv. H. Muhlolland arrived home yesterday from a short visit to Los Angeles and San Francisco.

A meeting of the Republican County Central Committee will be held at Independence on Friday evening, May 25th.

Charley Anthony came in from Darwin yesterday and expects to return to-day. He is interested in the sheep business just at present.

A. O Collins will go to Coyote Holes to meet his son-in-law, Bertrand Rhine, who is on his way here with a band of sheep from Tulare county.

It is said on good authority that in the event of the canal to Indian Wells Valley proving a success the Carson and Colorado people will complete their line to Mojave.

When in San Francisco last week we had the pleasure of meeting Cy Mulkey, formerly Sheriff of Inyo county from 1872 to '74. He inquired for many old time Inyo friends and wished to be remembered to them.

The number of Chinese registered in the entire country is 105,312, of whom 67,977 are in California and Nevada, 4,699 in Montana, Idaho and Utah and 1,791 in Arizona. The Chinese population by the first census was 107,485.

Matt. McDonald is excavating a cellar and getting ready to erect a new saloon on a site a little north of the burned building. The new structure will not be as large as the former one, but it will be nicely fitted up and made comfortable and cosey.

Superintendent Yerington, Assistant Superintendent Laws and Paymaster Mills of the Carson and Colorado railroad went to Keeler on a special train last Monday, returning next day. C. Taylor, Secretary to D. O. Mills, was also of the party.

John Carmichael, Inspector of United States Land Offices, arrived at Independence on Monday last. Mr. Carmichael spent the week investigating the affairs of the local office and adjusting the accounts. He will probably remain for several days in town.

R. W. Thomas and Ed. Ober were in Fresno early in the week. Ed. expects to be at Los Angeles to-morrow, where a match race of 100 yards will be run by Morris and Pulley. It is quite likely that a 75-yard race will be arranged between Ober and the winner.

About 10 o'clock this morning an alarm of fire was occasioned by a blaze in the corral adjoining Rhine's stable. A bucket brigade hastily assembled and the fire was extinguished before any damage resulted. There was a high wind blowing at the time and had the fire gained any headway a disastrous conflagration might have resulted.

The Value of Irrigation

No better object lesson as to the benefits to be derived from irrigation can be had than a trip through the San Joaquin Valley. From Bakersfield north toward Fresno, outside of the irrigated districts, one rides through miles of country that has no more vegetation than a street. Crops are an utter and entire loss. By contrast the irrigated districts resemble oases in the midst of a vast, barren desert. With the farmers of the San Joaquin a crop every year was an absolute necessity. The failure of this one year's crop brings ruin upon the great majority of them. With irrigation a crop every year is a certainty; and while the cost of production may be slightly higher this fact far more than overbalances the possibility of utter loss. The construction of the big canal to Salt Wells Valley will open up a large body of fine land for settlement, and it will be eagerly sought after. With the extension of the C. and C. railroad to Mojave a tide of immigration will be turned this way that in a very short time will settle up all the available land in Owens Valley. There is a strong probability of this being done and the next few months are fraught with matters of the greatest interest to us all.

Will Celebrate.

A meeting of the citizens of Independence was held at the Pavilion on Tuesday evening to discuss the question of giving a Fourth of July celebration at this place. Henry Rhine was selected as Chairman of the meeting and B. H. Yandell Secretary. It was unanimously determined to give a rousing celebration. The following committees were appointed and the meeting adjourned until next Tuesday evening:

Programme — Misses Lena Thomsen, Maggie Gorman, Nettie Roeper, Mrs. Webb and Mrs. Matlack.

Dance—Messrs. Taylor, Ober and Mairs.

Baseball—Messrs. Naylor, Holland and Yandell.

Games—Messrs. Hession, Gorman and Tate.

Finance—Messrs. Mairs, Irwin, Collins Roeper and Lamar.

George Meads arrived at Mojave last Tuesday with his big team and will commence hauling freight for the Salt Wells Borax Company. There were three carloads of freight for this company at Mojave last Monday. Their new plant will soon be in place and they expect to be turning out two ton of borax per day in a short time. The marsh is in an accessible location and the company can place their product on the market to good advantage. The promoters of the enterprise will undoubtedly reap a profitable reward.

Manuel Montaña died early last Friday morning from the effect of the wounds inflicted by Balentin Diaz. The killing was in every way a dastardly, cold-blooded murder. Montaña was well known all over the county, and had many friends. While he had a fearless nature he was not quarrelsome and was a man devoted to his friends and who would sacrifice himself to oblige them. It was while performing a kind act that he was mercilessly shot down in cold blood.

Charley Collins has a force of men and teams at work on the old racetrack south of town getting it in condition for driving and training purposes. A meeting of the Independence track Association will be held in a few days to make arrangements for putting their track in first-class condition for the races this fall.

W. H. Bradley, a well known mining man of Los Angeles, arrived at Keeler on Wednesday's stage and went on to Bishop yesterday morning to examine some mining property there. He expects to visit Independence and points in southern Inyo before returning to Los Angeles.

Foster is certainly a success as a weather prophet. As he predicted the weather for the past week all over the Coast has been unusually cold and disagreeable. There was quite a fall of rain in the southern counties on Monday, too late, however, to do any good.

Bronco is at the Bay District track where he is being handled by Wm. Short, a careful and competent trainer. The old horse met with a severe accident last winter from which he has recovered, however, and it is expected that he will start in a handi-cap race to-morrow.

A telephone line is in operation between the mining camp at Redrock and Mojave. There is quite a camp at Redrock, having stores, restaurants, saloons etc.

A Cheap Power,

And at the same time a reliable power, are the points to be sought for in purchasing an engine. With steam power a constant watch on the gauge is necessary to prevent accidents, and the expense for engineer is a serious item against economy. The gas or gasoline engine is by far the cheapest power, as it will run all day without attention or fear of accident, and the cost is about two cents per hour for fuel per horse power. For intermittent power the economy of gas over steam is beyond comparison. While these points of superiority are without question, it is important in selecting an engine to get the best; the best in the long run is the cheapest. Do not fail to investigate the striking advantages of the Hercules Gas and Gasoline Engines. Send for catalogue. If you want second-hand engines of other makes at cheap rates we can supply you. We have a number taken in trade and cannot take any more until they are realized on. PALMER & REY TYPE FOUNDRY, 405-407 Sansome Street, San Francisco.

THE VILLAGE PHYSICIAN.

A Case Where He Said Little, but He Thought Unutterable Things.

"The life of a village physician has its trials," said one a few days ago, "and, I may add," with a twinkle of the eye at some recollection, "its compensations too. One evening I returned about 11 from two or three professional visits and went to bed, fancying myself pretty safe for a night's rest, which I specially needed. I was hardly between the sheets, however, before the telephone rang. An old gentleman, a patient whom I had seen that day, was suffering from an attack of enteric colic, as he had before in the course of his illness, but which I thought I had guarded against for the immediate future.

"I dressed, went to the house and used some remedies, explaining that the attack would not be at once relieved, came home, undressed and went to bed again. I was fairly asleep when the whir of the telephone bell awakened me. It was the same patient, or rather his daughter. He was still suffering acutely, and would I come up again? The old gentleman is an especial friend as well as a patient of mine, and I answered the call a second time, though I questioned its necessity. I used more and stronger remedial measures, and again returned to my home and my bed. I had slept perhaps an hour when the telephone rang out its third warning, and I listened for the third time to the daughter's appeal to please come right away. I was pretty mad, but I swallowed my wrath, put on my clothes for toilet No. 3, and literally staggered up the street, reeling from want of sleep like a man who had been drinking.

"The milk carts were abroad and the dawn was struggling in the east when I reached my door after that visit, and too tired to take my clothes off again I threw myself on a lounge and was just sinking off into oblivion when that diabolical little instrument began its irritating clamor.

"'What is it?' I growled into the mouthpiece, and over the wire came reply:

"'Nothing, doctor, only I thought you might like to know that father is sleeping quietly.'

"What did I say? Well, I don't know that I said very much, but I hung that earpiece up with a click that was as good as some pretty tall swearing."—New York Times.

Patchouly.

The introduction of the perfume called patchouly was caused by the desire of French shawlmakers to deceive their customers. When shawls were first brought from India they were perfumed with patchouly, an extract of an Indian plant. The French soon learned to imitate the shawls to perfection, but the patchouly bothered them, as they could find no substitute for it, and this fact was used as the surest means of distinguishing the genuine India shawls from the French counterfeits. At last somebody discovered the secret and brought a quantity of patchouly to France. For a time the discoverers kept the matter to themselves and reaped a harvest. Then some one gave away the secret. The perfume soon became popular, and has never since passed completely out of use, though several times superseded temporarily by other perfumes.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Bad Temper.

"You say your wife gets mad and raises a row?" said Gus De Smith to Pete Amsterdam.

"I should say she did. She makes enough fuss to run a train 40 miles an hour. That's the way she has been doing all her life."

"But if you knew she was in the habit of getting mad, why did you marry her?"

"Because if I had held back she would have got madder than ever. I did it to pacify her, don't you see?"—Texas Siftings.

Diplomatic.

"Well, the cook's gone at last, John," said Mrs. B.

"Good. You must have had more courage than I gave you credit for to discharge her."

"I didn't do it. She discharged herself. I flattered her so about her cooking that she thought she was too good to stay in the country, and off she went."—Harper's Bazar.

HIS LITTLE JOKE.

How a Bad Subject Turned the Tables on an Insurance Agent.

Bob Keyworth of Houston is a tall man, upward of 6 feet high, but he looks as if he was not long for this world. He is hollow chested and so thin that he looks very much as if he had not had anything to eat since the war. When he passes along the streets, the undertakers come out and cast a long, lingering glance at him, and no wonder, for he has been inspiring them with hopes that have never been realized for the last 20 years. He has, moreover, a hacking cough that has the genuine graveyard ring to it.

Not long ago it occurred to him that it would be a good idea to have his life insured. He had previously experienced some astonishment that he had never suffered from the importunity of life insurance agents. To his surprise, he discovered that the companies were afraid to take any risks on his life; that he was a bad subject, as his death might occur at any time. Being of a somewhat humorous turn of mind, Bob made it a practice from that time on to worry life insurance agents on every possible occasion. Not long since he tackled one in the lobby of a Houston hotel. The agent represented an influential New York company. Introducing himself, Bob said:

"I just heard of your arrival and hurried over to see you. For some time past I have been wanting to get my life insured in some good company, and yours is first class."

The agent gazed at the living anatomy before him and was somewhat embarrassed. He hemmed and hawed a few times and said hesitatingly that he was only taking first class risks and that his visitor seemed to be rather feeble.

"Yes," said Bob, "I know I look consumptive, but I've looked this way all my life, and I ain't dead yet. My grandparents are living yet and are both upward of 90 years of age. The old man can thread a needle without crutches—I mean without glasses. I'm good for 100 myself."

The agent shook his head in a deprecatory sort of way.

"I never get drunk or commit suicide and have the digestive power of an anaconda," continued Bob persuasively.

"I don't care to insure your life," said the agent, with increasing firmness.

"That's what all these agents say when I talk to them, but I am offering you special inducements. It is a sacred duty you owe your company to insure my life, my dear sir. You may die before night, and then you will regret having refused my offer. If the company hears of it, they will dock your salary, and I shall make it my duty to let them know how you are neglecting their interests."

"Excuse me, but I have a business engagement," said the agent, trying to get away, but Bob reached out a skeleton hand and detained him, saying:

"I have been vaccinated several times, and it took each time. Besides I am a man of influence here, and if you succeed in insuring me there's no telling how many other prominent citizens of Houston you will capture."

"I'm too busy to listen to you."

"I don't wish to bore you," replied Bob, "so I will call again later in the day, when we will talk it over."

The suffering agent rushed out of the hotel, and Bob laughed until the tears rolled down his hollow cheeks.—Texas Siftings.

Not Available.

A certain "funny man," whose name is familiar to those who read the comic papers of the day, was making a deposit of some checks at his bank when the receiving teller remarked:

"Oh, well, Mr. B——, I suppose the hard times don't affect men of your profession? People must have poetry, I take it."

"Yes," said Mr. B—— cheerfully. "We poets thrive in hard times or easy times."

"I presume so," continued the teller. "It must be a pretty good business. I imagine that a poem of yours must be good for a hundred dollars anywhere you please to offer it."

"Ye-e-es," said Mr. B—— thoughtfully. "Oh, of course, of course," he added.

Two days later he went into the bank again and handed a deposit slip to the teller. It read thus:

Cash	$14 80
Checks	36 10
Four poems	400 00
Total	$450 90

But Mr. B——'s bankbook showed a deposit of only $50.90.—Philadelphia Times.

A Scandinavian fish peddler, unfamiliar with our language, was thrashing his horse while driving down the street. A lady belonging to the Society For the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals stopped him and exclaimed, "Have you no mercy, sir?"

ONLY GIRL AT OVERLOOK

By FRANKLIN FYLES.

It was more carelessly than intentionally that Gerald thus provoked Ravelli. There had been dislike between them, growing out of friction between their respective duties as a civil engineer and sub-contractor, for the former was necessarily a critic of the latter's work. But they had never quarreled, and Gerald saw nothing on this occasion, as Ravelli seemed to, for any outbreak of temper.

"Bettare be civ-vil witha your tongue," Ravelli sneered.

"Well, I think so, too, as we are with a lady."

"Zat ees whya I inseest you treata me as one gentleman."

So it seemed that he was especially regardful of how he figured in the presence of Mary Warriner.

"Like one gentleman? Oh, I will treat you like two gentlemen—so politely," and Gerald began to again nonchalantly whittle the birchen pole. "I was going to tell how, when at last we broke through the rock at this end of the tunnel, I happened to be right there. A blast tore out an aperture several feet wide. We saw daylight through the smoke. We rushed pell-mell over the broken stone, and struggled with one another to get through first. It was—why, it was you, Ravelli, wasn't it?—whom I tusseled with. Yes, we got into the breach together. You tried to push me back. You couldn't—of course you couldn't," and the narrator's reference to his own superior strength was exasperatingly accompanied by a glance not free from contempt.

"Eet was-a all een fun," Ravelli smilingly explained to Mary, and then his eyes turned darkly upon Gerald. "Eef eet had-a been one ear-nest fight"—The different result was vaguely indicated by a hard clinch of fists and a vicious crunch of teeth.

It was beyond a doubt that Ravelli could not bear to be belittled to Mary, but she and Gerald were alike inattentive to his exhibition of wrath.

"No prisoner was ever more exultant to escape," Heath went on, "than I was to get out of that dark, noisome hole into clear sunlight. I ran to this very spot, and—well, the landscape was on view, just as it is now. It was like getting from gloom out into glory."

The young man's exuberant words were not spoken with much enthusiasm, and yet they had sufficient earnestness to prove their sincerity. He had stopped whittling, and his knife lay on the desk as he turned his back against the sapling and rested both elbows on it.

"So I've been writing to the president of the company, urging him to deflect the route a trifle so that passengers might come out of the tunnel to see a landscape worth a thousand miles of special travel, and to be had by going less than as many feet. This is the very latest day for changing the survey. To-morrow will be too late. That is why I'm telegraphing so urgently."

Click, click, click! Mary went to the telegraphic instrument. She delivered the message by word of mouth, instead of taking it down in the usual manner with a pen.

"Gerald Heath, Overlook," she translated from the metallic language of the instrument; "your idea is foolish. We cannot entertain it. Henry Dockerman, president."

Gerald looked like a man receiving a jury's verdict involving great pecuniary loss, if not one of personal condemnation as he listened to the telegram.

"Zat ees whata I theenk," remarked Ravelli, with insolent elation; "you ar-r-e one-a fool, as ze president he say."

Gerald was already angered by the dispatch. The taunting epithet was timed to excite him to fury, which he impulsively spent upon the more immediate provoker. He seized Ravelli by the throat, but without choking him, and almost instantly let him go, as though ashamed of having assailed a man of not much more than half his own strength and nearly twice his age. With Italian quickness Ravelli grabbed Gerald's knife from the desk, against which he was flung. He would have used it, too, if self-defense had been necessary, but he saw that he was not to be further molested, and so he concealed the weapon under his arm, while Gerald strode away, unaware of his escape from a stab.

"He is a one beeg bully," said Ravelli, with forced composure. "Eef a lady had-a not been here"——

"You tormented him," the girl interrupted. "I once saw the best natured mastiff in the world lose his temper and turn on a"—— She stopped before saying "cur," and added instead: "If he was foolish you were not very wise to tease him."

"He is-a what to you, zat you take-a hees part?"

She bit her lips in resentment, but made no reply.

"Pare-haps he is one-a lover oof you?"

Still she would not reply to his impertinence. That angered him more than the severest rejoinder would have done.

"Oh, I am sure-a zat he ees one suitor."

She gave way at length to his provocation, and yet without any violent words, for she simply said: "You are insulting, while he is at least reasonably polite—when he needs me at all, which isn't often."

"Not-a often? But some-what closely he need-a you. See zat."

With an open palm he struck the place on the sapling where Gerald had whittled. The spot was on the outer edge, where Mary could not see it from her seat. She went round to the front of the primitively constructed desk or high counter to gratify her curiosity. There she saw that Gerald had carved a hand, her own hand, as she instantly perceived. The small and shapely member was reproduced in the fresh pale wood with rare fidelity. She had unconsciously posed it while working the key of the telegraphic instrument under the jack-knife sculptor's eyes, and there had been ample time for him to whittle a fac-simile into the birch.

"He is almost as impertinent as you are," she said, and turned to see how Ravelli took the comment.

But Ravelli had disappeared.

Then, being alone, she laid a hand of her own coquettishly alongside its wooden counterpart, and critically admired the likeness.

"It was an unwarranted liberty," she said to herself, "but he did it very well."

The delicate fiber of the wood had favored the carver's purpose. The imitation hand bore a shade of flattery in the barely tinted birchen white and in the fine grained satin smoothness that the keen blade had wrought, but this was not too much for more than a reasonable compliment. As to the modeling, that was sincerely accurate, and the fingers rested on the key precisely as Mary had seen them during many hours of many days. It is an excessively vain girl who admires herself as actually as she does a portrait, and the telegrapher really saw more beauty in the birchen hand than she had ever observed in the live one. As she contemplated it Ravelli returned noiselessly behind her.

"I-a wish to say some-thing, Mees Warriner."

The Italian accent of Ravelli grated with unnatural harshness on Mary's ears, and if he had been an intruder upon her privacy instead of a man in a really public place she would not have been surprised into a deep flush. She snatched her hand away from its wooden counterpart and clasped it with its mate behind her as she leaned her shoulder against the carving to hide it.

"If you have a message to send," she said, "I can't get it on the wire too soon. It's within five minutes of time to shut off."

She started to go behind the desk. He stopped her with a touch upon her shoulder and she shrank away reprovingly, although it was solely the man's earnestness that made him do it.

"No, no. It ees not words for-a ze wire zat I have-a for you," he said. "I wish-a to tell to yourself something. Will you leesten?"

"Yes, if it is something that I ought to hear."

"Thees eez it. I am a-more than I seem here—deef-e-rent—so deef-e-rent you would hardly know-a me. In zis place I am on-ly a contractor for ze laborer. I am-a as common as my gang in-a clothes—in-a manner too, eh? But een one hour—een one minute—I could-a conveence you zat I am-a someting finer."

Mary did not show in her perfectly regained composure that she was so much as puzzled by the man's enigmatic talk. She said, "I don't see how it could be worth while, Mr. Ravelli."

"Oh, yes. I beg-a par-don for ze contradic-tion—yes, it ees worth-a while. Away from-a here, Mary, I would-a be so deef-e-rent zat you a-love me."

"Stop, Mr. Ravelli—stop!"

The command was positive, but it was not obeyed.

"I love-a you"——

He caught her by one wrist as he began. She was utterly unresistant. If she had struggled or cried out he would have gone on with his voluble, excited declaration, but her placidity was incomprehensible to him.

"Mr. Ravelli," she began, after a moment, "you understand English?"

"Perfectly, Mees Warriner."

"Well, here is plain English for you. I would use Italian if I could, so that you mightn't mistake me. You are to let go of my hand."

He did it.

"You are to go away instantly and never come here again except on business. Go at once."

That he did not do.

"For what-a did you come here, into one camp oof men, eef"——

"If I didn't expect to be unsafe? I'll tell you. It was a mistake. Operator No. 9 was ordered to this post. No. 9 had been a man who within a week had been discharged and his number given to me. By an oversight no alteration was made in the record to show the sex of the new No. 9. I couldn't afford to lose the work. Besides"——

"Well, a—besides"——

"Besides, I reasoned that every man at Overlook would protect me against all the other men, if"——

"Yes, eef"——

"Yes, if I cared absolutely nothing for any single one of them. Therefore I am not afraid. But you must not annoy me."

Fury flashed into the man's eyes, into his reddened face, into the sudden tension of his gripped hands. The girl's contemptuous indifference maddened him. She saw this and was at once alarmed, for she realized that here was a reckless lover—one who heated dangerously where another would have chilled under disdain; but she maintained an unshaken voice as she said: "You may as well know, however, that I am amply protected. The night watchman is ordered to include this combined office and residence of mine in every round he makes; so I sleep quite unconcernedly. In the daytime, too, I shall have defense, if it becomes necessary."

A Loophole For Escape.

"Thompson, while bicycling yesterday, rang for a baby carriage to make way. It did not, and the baby was killed and he arrested."

"How can he excuse himself?"

"He pleaded self defense."

"The dickens!"

"Yes. It turned out the baby was his and teething."—Life.

THE COMPLEXION OF A CHINESE

Is not yellower than that of an unfortunate individual whose liver complaint has assumed the chronic form. The eyeballs of the sufferer assume a saffron hue, there is dull pain in the region of the organ affected, the tongue is coated, breath sour, sick headaches usually but not always occur, and there is sometimes dizziness on arising from a sitting posture. Constipation and dyspepsia are also attendants of this very common ailment, always in its aggravated form, liable to breed abscesses of the liver, which are very dangerous. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters wholly eradicates it, as well as the troubles complicated with it and which it originates. In chills and fever, a complaint which always yields to the Bitters, the liver is seriously involved. This fine alterative tonic removes costiveness and indigestion, rheumatic, nervous and kidney trouble and debility.

SYMPATHETIC PAINS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are just the remedy in such cases. They are soothing in their effect, and draw out the pain so that the back or side or limbs are supple instead of stiff, and free to perform their functions.

They have been tried by thousands and millions of people in every land, and with one uniform result, entire satisfaction.

TIME AND LOVE.

Sly old Time took little Cupid,
Tied a kerchief o'er his eyes;
Turned him 'round, exclaiming, "Stupid,
Tell me where your true love lies!"
Long as moons shall shine above,
Time will play his tricks on Love.

Cupid, of his power reminded,
Showed old Time what he could do;
And, that though his eyes were blinded,
Yet his heart would guide him true.
Long as suns the heaven shall climb,
Love will foil the trick of Time.
—Robert Brown, Jr., in London Academy.

SCHMIDT'S WILL.

Yesterday morning the community was inexpressibly shocked to hear that our well known and honored citizen, John Schmidt, of East Darby township, had passed away from our midst. Mr. Schmidt came from Holland to this country when quite a lad. By honesty and industry he amassed a farm of eighty acres, and was universally respected. Owing to our going to press today, we must postpone his biography until next week, but we understand his real and personal estate is left to a nephew. The deceased came to his death by catching cold while killing hogs.—Darby Banner of Freedom.

Notwithstanding the "inexpressible shock" to the East Darby community, very little excitement was visible when the worthy John Schmidt was laid in his grave. On account of a spell of dry weather a great many farmers staid at home to attend to the haying, and not more than twenty people all told listened to the new clergyman, who had not even known the deceased by sight, while he spoke in flowery periods for five minutes. In fact, as Jonas Waters, the selectman, remarked, "Nobody could be expected to take much stock in a man that never got married nor went to church." Interest centered, however, on one old man and one young one, both dressed in black and both strangers to the community.

Presently it became known, in the mysterious way in which things do become known, that the old man was a lawyer from New York and the young man a nephew of the deceased and the presumable heir to his wealth. Then from the same occult source there came the information that John Schmidt's will would be read at his former residence day after next.

Thither flocked threescore of Darby's citizens, male and female, actuated simply by curiosity, since no neighbor was insane enough to suppose that the old gentleman would leave anything to him or the town. The old lawyer was on hand, with a smug and mysterious air; so was the young nephew in black, and so also were three strangers, also in black, of varying ages and visages, but alike in nervous twitching of lips and suspicious distrust of one another.

"It was the wish of my esteemed client, John Schmidt, that his last will and testament should be read in public within three days after his decease," said the old lawyer, producing a large envelope and exhibiting it to the audience. "The law does not require this formality and it is against my advice, but that is immeterial. I will also add that I do not know the contents of this will, since it is a holograph."

Seeing an expression of wonder, bordering upon perplexed dismay, spreading over the audience, the old lawyer hastened to add, "That is, written by the testator himself."

Calm being restored the lawyer, with exasperating slowness, opened the envelope, and after a proper pause began to read in a manner which, at first eminently professional, soon became decidedly diffuse:

"I, John Schmidt, farmer, of Darby county, N. Y., here make my will. I have this farm and the houses on it [not couched in legal phraseology, my friends, but I have no doubt it will stand], which I value at $3,000 [his valuation will have to be verified], and I also have an iron box"—[Here the lawyer produced in a legerdemain sort of way a small box from the interior of his coat and remarked, "Here is the box—it has been in my possession for two years." Then continuing]—"iron box which contains the remainder of my fortune—$100,000."

A prolonged whistle from Elder Jackson and "Jewhittaker" from Jabez Waters broke the silence, while the nephew and the three strangers in black looked red and blue by turns.

The old lawyer held up his hands warningly and proceeded: "Some people think I don't know anything, but I'll show them John Schmidt is no fool. I made all this money at one lucky stroke in New York."

"Bin speculatin," said Jabez Waters in a loud whisper. "Stocks."

"Loozyanner lott'ry," responded the elder, in a piously hoarse voice.

"I worked hard," read the lawyer in a sharp voice to command silence, "for years, but made more in one day than I ever did in all my life. And now I leave all I've got to my nephew—(er—hum—yes)—John Smith." The old lawyer folded up the will and had just remarked, "The will is properly signed and"—when the nephew hurried forward.

"My poor, dear uncle," he exclaimed, dabbing his eyes vigorously with his handkerchief, "I always knew"——

"Pardon me," said one of the strangers in black; "will you allow me to look at the will? Thanks—oh, yes—as I supposed."

"You supposed?" repeated Nephew John tremulously.

"Yes, as I supposed. On looking closer," to the old lawyer, "you will see that the name of the legatee is Jehu Smith. My poor, dear uncle"——

"It strikes me," interrupted the second man in black, looking over Jehu's shoulder, "that Uncle John has written Joshua. He never was a good speller or writer, but the last time I saw him he gave me to ununderstand"——

"And I give you to understand," cried the third man, rising from his chair and speaking in a bloodthirsty voice, "that my name is Job Smith, and I am a full cousin of John's, and if I've been forgotten I'll know the reason why."

An expression almost beatific stole over the old lawyer's face.

"A contest," he murmured softly. "Gentlemen, as executor of this will I find that this question cannot be decided at this time and place. I shall hold the will"——

"But the box?" said Nephew John.

"I shall also hold the box until an agreement is had or the courts decide on the rightful heir."

A quadrilateral howl arose, but the old lawyer buttoned his rusty coat with the air of a chief justice, and the Darby people, who were all agog over the impending fracas and possible homicide, were disappointed. While the heirs wrangled among themselves the attorney slipped away with the will and the box, and while the four contestants vainly shouted after the vanishing buggy the bucolic audience adjourned to the postoffice to talk it over.

John, Joshua, Jehu and Job made their way to the hotel and disputed for seven or eight hours, until the landlord, who was also a justice of the peace, threatened arrest for disorderly behavior, whereupon they broke away and departed by various routes.

The next month brought forth new complications in re the estate of John Schmidt, deceased. A cousin named John came from Nova Scotia to see about "that air will," and hardly had he finished abusing the lawyer and the rival claimants when Job No. 2, from Nevada, made his appearance. He was a large man, with a cowboy air and the odor of bad tobacco, and in fifteen minutes had made himself so wearisome that he had to be removed by the police. Next appeared the widow of another John with eight children, and finally a Joel, who was a cashier in a bank and a very superior person.

The old lawyer began to be alarmed. Instead of going to law in a rational manner the heirs had a disagreeable habit of coming to the office in squads and discussing the will with clenched fists. More than one valuable client had been frightened away, and the lawyer was losing his nerve. Finally he retained himself as the attorney of the cowboy Job, who seemed to be the most willing to spend his money, and ejected the others. The widow with her eight children sat on the stairs for three days, but finally disappeared at the rumor of a compromise.

It came from the cashier. One of his friends went fishing and put his office at Joel's disposal, who was presently joined by the warring contingent in response to a circular note.

"My friends," said the cashier affably, "we are playing a losing game. If we continue this controversy much longer it will get into the courts and never get out again. In the end the lawyers will get every penny and we will get the dump—as we say in banking circles. Our deceased friend wrote like a bank president, and it is impossible to make out whether the name in dispute is John, Jehu, Job, Joel or Joshua. The last time I looked at it I thought it was Jabez, which of course is quite impossible. But fancy the effect of all this on a jury! My friends, we must compromise."

"Very well," said Nephew John, "I am quite willing. I will take half and the remainder"— For the next five minutes the uproar was so great that three or four men with shiny hats came up from the street, thinking a ward caucus was in session, but the intruders were finally expelled and order was restored. The debate continued, however, for two hours longer until an agreement was reached to share and share alike, the original Nephew John to take in addition the Schmidt homestead as a solace to his first disappointment.

Nine o'clock next morning found seven claimants, each with a lawyer, waiting on Job and his lawyer, and the old clerk said afterward that he never heard so much noise since he quit attending vestry meetings, and even the office boy was scared. But the eight lawyers and the eight clients finally drew up a mighty agreement as to how much each client was to get, and then each client signed an agreement as to how much his lawyer was to get, and red seals and gold seals and notarial stamps where put on wherever there was a blank space on the papers, and all the clients swore to everything with reckless indifference.

All preliminaries being settled the final act of the great drama of human interest was begun. The old lawyer performed another sleight of hand trick and the iron box made its second appearance, while the silence was so intense that almost anything might have been heard to drop.

A number of seals had to be broken to get at a bundle wrapped up in a newspaper. On top lay a slip of white paper.

"Ha! a memorandum!" said the old lawyer. Then he read aloud:

"This fortune cost me just $1,000.—J. S."

He removed the newspaper and disclosed a great bundle of brand new bank bills, that crackled in an agreeable manner as he rumpled their ends.

"Ah! One hundred thousand dollars! They appear to be all one hundred and five hundreds. Perhaps our friend, the cashier, will verify the amount?"

The cashier came forward on the run, while everybody gathered around to see fair play. He gave the notes a professional fillip, and then they dropped from his nerveless hands.

"Green goods!" he gasped.

In the following autumn the house and farm of the late John Schmidt were taken in execution and sold to pay the eight lawyers, and even then they had to scale down their bills to make the realized sum go around.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Plenty of Points.

Inventive genius promises to do away with all of those petty annoyances which are the most prolific sources of profanity. True, the saint has not yet appeared who is ready to furnish mankind at a small cost with a patent collar button finder or with an opera glass warranted to see through a "love of a bonnet" designed on the Eiffel tower lines, but even those blessings may be hoped for. However, all ye who in a loud voice or under thy breath make thyselves undeserving of the gift of speech over such a trivial matter as the breaking off of the points of thy lead pencils at the most inopportune time, there is no longer any excuse for thee. Genius has wiped out that cause of thy undoing. Relief has come in the shape of a pencil which while not everlastingly pointed yet gives opportunity to men to break about as many points as any reasonable man would want to break and still have a point left to keep on writing with.

The article consists of a very light metal tube, shaped and colored like an ordinary lead pencil. In this tube are inserted about a dozen short and nicely sharpened pencil points. If you break off the first you just pull it out and stick it in the top. That forces the second point down into position. So you can keep on, getting a new point whenever you break one off by just pulling out the broken point and sticking it in the top of the tube.

"But what do you do when you have broken off all of the dozen pencil points?"

Why, just throw the whole business away. The little tube with its load of sharpened pencils costs just about the same as an ordinary pencil, and will do just about the same amount of work. With it, however, you always have command of a sharpened pencil point, and you never have to smudge your fingers as you do when sharpening a pencil.—New York Times.

What She Paid.

A woman entered a dry goods store and asked to see some calico. The clerk took some down and said it was "thirteen cents a yard."

"Thirty cents a yard!" the woman exclaimed in a high pitched voice, "I never gave over twenty—for that same pattern too!"

"Well, you may have this for twenty, then," the clerk answered.

"Ten yards of it," and she smiled serenely at the thought of the discount she had secured by her own cleverness.

As it was, she had paid more than was asked, but had misunderstood the clerk, and endeavored to beat down the price.—New York Recorder.

STENOGRAPHERS.

Thousands of People Taught Stenography Each Year in America.

A FEW EXPERTS GET HIGH SALARIES

The Art is Not a New One as it Dates Back to Cicero, Who Used More Than 7,000 Characters.

There are more stenographers in New York and its vicinity than there are lawyers or doctors. But not all of them are competent. A first class shorthand writer is very difficult to find, and if he is a fast writer he is sure of a good salary.

Shorthand writing as a means of earning a livelihood is not as lucrative as many other callings, but it affords a young man, if he is quick witted, a fine chance to watch the internal workings of a business house, and thereby helps him toward a business education such as he could get in no other way.

The only field that is highly remunerative is law reporting, but to become competent for this work requires years of assiduous practice, and the field of employment is limited. The highest salary paid to a court stenographer in New York is in the surrogate's court. Mr. Edward F. Underhill, probably the oldest practicing stenographer in America, holds this position and receives a salary of $3,000 per year. He has been in the service since 1849.

The municipal departments and courts in New York city pay annually in salaries for stenographic services $154,000. This salary list includes 90 stenographers, 27 of whom are court reporters, each receiving $2,500, and 19 $2,000 annually as salary. In addition to this, however, all court stenographers are allowed by the code 10 cents per folio of 100 words, for furnishing copies of transcripts to the parties interested in any case when desired.

Up town at 353 West Twenty-third street the stenographers of New York have a club, where they meet each other socially. In connection with the club is a "classroom," where the members may practice the art of shorthand writing. Here nearly every evening are gathered scores of ambitious young shorthanders industriously driving their pens for love of perfection in their craft, while some one of experience reads or dictates. The classroom is provided with all the different styles of typewriting machines for the use of members when there is no dictation. The club also maintains an employment bureau. The club is open to either sex. In fact, it is the large membership of young ladies that gives zest to the social side of the club, which is one of its important features. In the winter the club gives receptions, entertainments, occasionally a dinner and once every year a ball.

In many of the public schools of the country stenography is a part of the training. An evidence of its recent remarkable growth is shown by a circular issued by the bureau of education at Washington.

Here it is shown that from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1890, 57,375 persons received instruction in the art of shorthand in schools and colleges in the United States. Five thousand five hundred and fifty of these were in New York and Brooklyn. A similar circular was issued by the bureau in 1881, in which it was shown that during the year 1882 the number of pupils receiving such instruction was 12,470. It is therefore quite safe to say that the number for 1893 exceeded 75,000.

But this number does not take into consideration an army probably equally large who receive instruction from some other source or from professional stenographers.

Out of this vast army, however, but a very small minority are either physically or mentally qualified to become court reporters or even office amanuenses.

Cicero is said to have been the inventor of shorthand writing, and the freedman, Marcus Tullius Tiro, his friend, the first stenographer, and he undoubtedly did use a method of shorthand writing as early as 60 B. C.

The first English treatise was by Timothe Bright, entitled "An Arte of Shorte Swifte and Secrete Writing by Characture, Inuented by Timothe Bright, Doctor of Phisike. Imprinted at London by I. Windet, the Assingee of Tim Bright, 1588. Cum priuilegie Regiae Maiestatis. Forbidding all others to print the same."

Dr. Bright in this work says: "Cicero did account it worthie his labour, and no less profitable to the Roman common weale (Most Gracious Soueraigne), to inuent a speedie kinde of wryting by character, as Plutarch reporteth in the life of Cato the younger. This invention was increased afterward by Seneca: that the number of characters grue to 7,000. Whether through inure of time, or that the men gaue it over for tediousness of learning, nothing remaineth extant of Cicero's inuention at this day."

Every stenographer who recalls the efforts required to properly master the few characters used in the art today will not wonder that of Cicero's system, with its 7,000 characters, nothing remains at this day.

It was not until 1642 that the art became of any practical use, and it was first used in the house of lords in 1699 in taking testimony in a divorce suit. Stenographers were not regularly employed in parliament, however, until 1802.—New York World.

Loss of Confidence.

The ability of the average colored servant in the south to steal with impunity from his or her employer, as the case may be, is truly phenomenal.

"How's yer comin on in yer new place?" asked Jim Webster of Matilda Snowball.

"I'ze done laid up moah den $20, and I hain't drawed a cent ob wages yet."

"Ain't yer afeered dey will hold back yer wages when dey comes ter pay you?"

"No; I'ze got puffec' conferdence in 'em."

Signaling by Balloon.

A series of interesting experiments was conducted the other night at Stanford Bridge Grounds, London, with balloon and apparatus invented and improved by Mr. Eric Bruce for use in military signaling at night over intervening woods and hills. Within the balloon are hung on a small swinging ladder six incandescent lamps, connected by insulated cable with a battery on the ground, worked that night at twenty-four volts and giving sixty candle power of illumination. By ready manipulation of the buttons at the instrument the operator flashes on the translucent sides of the balloon the signals of the Morse or any code, and these can be easily read at a distance of six miles.

The balloon used was a small one of eighteen feet diameter, containing 1,000 feet of gas, and was held by cable at a height of about 300 feet. The strong wind prevailing rendered the position of the balloon unsteady and uncertain, but the signals were nevertheless read by military experts, and were answered from a station on land. The experiments were witnessed by Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, by military attaches of the Chinese and other embassies and a number of scientific men. The experiments were varied by hanging the lamps outside below the neck of the balloon and flashing direct. The illuminated balloon when a few feet above ground gives a beautiful light, and can be utilized when required for executing work at night.—London News.

Lionized the Wrong Englishman.

The Hotel Del Monte at Monterey, Cal., is stirred up over a ludicrous mistake by which a prosaic English merchant was lionized as Robert Buchanan, poet and dramatist.

The Briton arrived at the hotel three days ago with two friends. He registered in a fine, literary hand, and as he bore a strong resemblance to the author several ladies present declared he must be the author of "The Shadow of the Sword." So several ladies desired him to write his autograph in their albums with some poetical sentiment. He received all their flattery complacently, but grinding out poetry for them kept him up all night and the result was something to shake confidence in their idol.

The next day he was the center of an admiring group. His companions became suspicious and asked the hotel clerk why so much attention was paid their friend. They were amazed when they learned the true reason, because they declared their friend had never heard of Buchanan. They broke the news gently to him, but his conceit received a great shock. All three packed and left before disclosures came.—Cor. Chicago Herald.

The Wilde Boys' First Appearance.

It is not generally known that the brothers Oscar and Willie Wilde first came to public notice on the occasion of the centenary of Thomas Moore at Dublin about fifteen years ago. It was proposed to perform an ode specially written for the occasion by Mr. S. N. Elrington and composed by the well known Irish composer, John William Glover. The Wilde brothers, assisted by Mr. Sexton, the member for West Belfast, and then on the staff of The Nation, led a furious and successful opposition against the official adoption of the Nolan-Glover ode.

It may be only a coincidence that the music to "The Poet and Puppets" at the Comedy theater is written by a grandson of the rejected composer.—Irish Times.

In Chains in India.

The practice of binding religious persons still exists in India, as is evidenced by the following from the Allahabad (India) Pioneer. The incident occurred recently at Meerut: A fakir, wearing nearly five maunds (100 pounds) of iron chains and bands on him, recently left the cantonment station. The railway authorities declined to allow him to travel as a passenger, but sent him as goods by weight, in spite of his argument that native women were never charged for their anklets and bangles. The iron absorbed the heat so much that the man had to be incessantly sprinkled with water. He is an old man and nearly died at the station.

Luck in Photographing Lightning.

One of the most remarkable and successful photographs of lightning ever known was made by Mr. Rusk, at Haines Falls, in the Catskills, during the electrical display the other night. The lateral zigzag streaks of fire against the massive slope of Mount Lincoln were instantaneously caught in the exposure and are plainly and sharply shown in the print, which also shows bursting bolts of lightning in the upper atmosphere, where the vivid illumination casts wonderful shadows upon the surrounding mountains. The print is an interesting study of atmospheric electricity.—Albany Journal.

A Word About His Mother.

A neat report is recorded of the Marquis of Carmarthen, the Duke of Leed's eldest son, who, at the recent elections in England, was returned for Brixton by a large majority. The night before the election, while he was addressing a mass meeting, he was interrupted by a cry of, "Does your mother know you're out?"—a reference to his very youthful appearance. "Oh, yes, she knows I'm out," said the young candidate, "and she hopes tomorrow she'll know I'm in."—London Letter.

The Failure of the Peach Crop.

The newspapers come filled with reports of the failure of the eastern fruit crops. The Maryland and Delaware peach crop, which is the heaviest competitor we have for our California product, is reckoned at less than one-sixth of an average yield. The heavy rains have caused a dropping of fruit in the peach country. The loss is over $2,000,000 to the eastern peach growers.—Pomona (Cal.) Progress.

ENGLISH SPORTS.

The Many Ways in Which the British Laborers Amuse Themselves.

GAMES BEST LIKED BY THEM.

Most the North Countrymen Love Vigorous Sports and Those in Which a Dog is Principal.

A cynical Frenchman who claimed to have closely studied the subject once announced his conclusion that the British workman's chief sport and almost sole amusement was beating his wife. His dictum has been widely accepted, until it has come to be almost an axiom. But it does the British workman injustice. Not all of his class are bad, as this would make out, while the majority are fertile in amusement resources. Taking them as a whole, it is likely that no similar class in any other country has such varied resources of sport or is so zealous in its pursuit as the British workman.

Perhaps it is in the colliery districts that sport, in all its peculiar forms, most flourishes, for colliers usually have more spare time than other rough manual workers, and used to have much more money. Here some "event" or another may be seen any day of the week, Sunday especially, in which usually the collier's dog, his chief instrument of entertainment, is the principal figure.

Rabbit coursing, one of his principal amusements, has a recognized place among the standard sports of Britain, and receives great attention in the sporting press. Dog racing is another favorite sport in the north. The course is usually about 200 yards long, and the races, in handicaps, are run off in heats. The dogs are trained to race at highest speed and exert themselves, without rider or other inducement, as much as does a race horse. The owner of each animal plants himself in the course just past the finishing post and urges his animal on with shouts, imprecations and wild gesticulations. The animals are slipped at one end and tear down the course at hottest speed between the throngs of excited spectators, allowing nothing to divert them from the effort to be first past the post. Hog racing handicaps are regular attractions on Lancashire racing grounds, and the stakes run from $100 to $200, or even $500.

Rat coursing is another popular pastime. Advertisements in newspapers and posted on billboards and fences may regularly be seen, announcing that some public house keeper will "give £5 to be coursed for at rats by all classes of terriers, fighting dogs barred." A sweepstake is made with the stake offered and the entry fees, and the whole affair conducted with much formality and solemnity. The referee and the rats are furnished by a professional rat catcher. A dollar a dozen is the average price for rats. A long stretch of green turf is inclosed and boarded up a foot or two in height for a course. The rat catcher has the rats all together in a sack, and he deftly snatches one out with his bare hand and tosses it into the inclosure. Two dogs are slipped in after the rat has had a short start, and the first to kill wins. The rats are usually very nimble, and the dogs need to be clever as well as swift.

Plain rat killing divides high honors with rat coursing as a well patronized game among northern British "sports." A match usually arises out of a discussion over the merits of two dogs, but gate money is charged, betting books are opened, and when the event is called it has developed into an affair as exciting as a horse race. A match is usually for 20 rats a side. The rats are starved, so as to make them wiry and fierce. The whole 20 are turned into the pit at one time, are made to run around for a few minutes, then the first dog is turned in, the referee touches his stop watch, and the "sport," watched by hundreds of human eyes, begins. The dogs are trained to their part, and often 20 rats are killed in less than 20 seconds. The other dog is turned in with the remaining 20 rats, and the victory is dependent on a comparison of the respective times occupied by each dog in killing its quota.

Trail hunting by dogs is another popular sport. It is conducted on the same general plan as are the anise bag hunts by our fashionable fox hunting clubs, except that only the dogs take part in the hunt, and the first dog in at the death gets the figurative brush. A hilly stretch of country is chosen, and a swift runner trails an anise bag over a difficult route, up hill and down dale, through hedges and over high stone fences, ending in a long, staked out homestretch. The dogs are let loose and they follow the trail at full speed, persistently and ardently, until they come in a yelping spurt over the homestretch to the finish. This is an attractive sport, and a good trail hunt is worth seeing.

Bird singing matches are another prominent amusement. It is not an exciting sport to the uninitiated, but to the northern British workman, with his money up, it is intensely exciting. The birds, in cages covered with a screen of cloth, are placed side by side on a table, or hung together on the wall of a room. At a given signal the cloths are removed and the contest begins. Not a whisper is heard in the room, crowded as it is with an excited audience. First one bird chirps or trills or bursts into song, and then another. Or perhaps one or all remain persistently silent. The contest is in heats of so many minutes each, and is decided on a mystifying basis of trills, chirps, warbles and various oddly named and distinguished notes. Sometimes a too eager owner will chirp or otherwise encourage his bird, which brings down a storm of profane expostulation and may precipitate a fight.

Brass band contests are a form of amusement in which the whole community may share. They are scarcely peculiar to the north, for now almost every large Sunday school in an English town has a brass band organized among its members. If not a brass band, then a drum and fife corps, which is unlike the corps familiar in this country in that the proportion is about one drum to half a dozen or more fifes. Most villages of importance in the north have their local brass bands, and local contests are frequent, while occasionally there will be a national contest at some seaside resort. They are a source of delight to the British workman, to whom the main interest is in the money bet on the result.—New York Sun.

A Mystery of the Bordens' Clock.

A singular coincidence in connection with the Borden murder is that the calendar pointer on the old fashioned clock at the residence on Second street stopped on the 4th, the date of the murder, and still points to that date. The other works of the clock are not impaired, but tick off the minutes and the hours with usual regularity.—Fall River (Mass.) News

A Sea Serpent in Lake Erie.

While the schooner Madeline Downing, on its way from Buffalo to this city, was passing the Dunning, about 150 miles east of here in Lake Erie, Captain Patrick Woods saw about half a mile ahead the waters of the lake lashed into a foam.

Drawing near, to the surprise of the captain and all on board, a huge sea serpent wrestling about in the waters as if fighting with an unseen enemy was seen. It soon quieted down and lay at full length on the surface of the water.

Captain Woods estimates it to be about fifty feet in length and not less than four feet in circumference of body. Its head was projecting from the water about four feet. He says it was a terrible looking object. It had viciously sparkling eyes and a large head. Fins were plainly seen seemingly sufficiently large to assist the snake in propelling itself through the water. The body was dark brown in color, which was uniform all along. From what he says it would be capable of crushing a yawl boat and its occupants.

As the vessel passed on its course the snake was seen disporting itself on the lake. At the time he saw it the lake was calm and there could have been no mistake in recognizing the object.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Sermons as an Investment.

What is the most paying form of literature? Under certain circumstances, apparently, sermons. The sermon which Canon Fleming recently preached at Sandringham has already realized a profit of £1,300. Considering the comparative brevity of such a contribution to literature, this must almost be a "record" in publishing profits. Thirteen hundred pounds is no very excessive sum for a three volume novel, but for a pamphlet not much larger than a leading article in a newspaper it is a unique price.

But, then, the circumstances were unique. The sermon was preached by command of the Princess of Wales, and it had special reference to the premature death of the heir presumptive to the crown. One is glad to know that the excellent Gordon Boys' home has profited by the large sum realized by the sale which Canon Fleming has generously placed at its disposal.—St. James' Gazette.

An Adventure with Black Snakes.

John B. Snyder, of Barto, Berks county, the skillful watchmaker, was out after wild raspberries the other day on the premises of his brother, Jacob Snyder, above Forgedale, when he met with quite an adventure. He was busy among some briers and brambles, when a big black snake suddenly reared up near him and came at him full tilt. The only weapon Snyder had was his berry kettle, which he swung at the head of the serpent, knocking it over, then jumped upon and dispatched the enemy.

Just then down from a bush dropped the mate of the ugly reptile and at once showed fight, but this one also got a whack with the kettle and was soon killed. Mr. Snyder lost all his berries and left the field somewhat nervous and excited after his set-to and victory. The "snaix" were about 5½ feet long.—Pottstown Leader.

A Unique Fishing Scene.

Lowell people at Ocean Park had an experience that will enable them to tell about the largest fish story of the season. Soon after dinner it was discovered that the bluefish were driving mackerel in schools into Goose Fair brook, a stream about knee deep and a rod wide. By 4 o'clock probably 150 persons—men, women, boys and girls—were hard at work in the water. Every male who arrived at the scene of action promptly divested himself of shoes and stockings and entered the water. The women and girls did the same.

Altogether a conservative estimate would make the afternoon catch at least an ordinary one horse cart full.—Lowell Mail.

Arrested in the Eighth Inning.

Two twelve-year-old colored lads climbed a tree one day and proceeded to watch the ball game without liquidating at the box office. All would have been serene if they had not broken off several branches of the tree. The owner of the tree, who happened to be in the grounds, saw the destruction of his shade tree, and getting an officer, slipped around and pulled the boys from their perch. The youths did not mind being arrested, which occurred in the last half of the eighth inning, but begged the officer to let them remain until the game was finished.—Washington Letter.

A Giant, and Still Growing.

A young man came to the city this evening from Monterey en route northward and soon had crowds following him everywhere he went. His name is Arthur Johnson, and he is a native of Santa Cruz. He is only eighteen years of age, but 6 feet 9½ inches in his stockings and weighs about 180 pounds. He measures 36 inches about the waist and 38 about the chest. He is still growing.—Sacramento Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

Undaunted by Defeat.

While female suffrage has carried the day in New Zealand, it has experienced defeat in South Australia, where the adult suffrage bill, which embodied the principle, was rejected in the popular house on the third reading, but only by a narrow majority. The friends of the cause, however, are not at all discouraged and will return to the battle with undaunted spirits till victory crowns their efforts.—Melbourne Letter.

He Used to Be a Dentist.

Michael Cohn is a barber and he used to be in the dental profession. Some time ago a woman went into his place and had him extract a tooth. The woman was in the employ of the State Dental society, and Cohn paid a fine of fifty dollars, imposed by Judge Fitzgerald, in the court of general sessions, for illegally practicing dentistry.—New York Letter.

MODEL OF A SHIP.

It is Built of Blocks of Wood From the Drawings on Paper.

A VERY INTERESTING OPERATION.

It is Said That England was Behind the Other Leading Nations Until Quite Recently.

Who would ever have imagined that a great ship—a modern wonder of the sea like the Paris or the Camperdown—is built as a woman makes a dress or a tailor cuts out a suit of clothes? That is the fact. Ships nowadays are built from patterns, and those patterns do not greatly differ in appearance or in fact from those which enable American women to copy the fashion in dress. To be sure, a tailor's and dressmaker's patterns are made of paper and are laid upon cloth or dress goods, while a shipbuilder's patterns are of wood, and steel and iron are made to follow them. That is perhaps the greatest difference between the methods of high grade tailoring and high grade shipbuilding, so far as their first steps go.

The English have only lately begun to value the model as the basis of shipbuilding. A famous American shipbuilder says that the model of the yacht America was the first model he ever saw in England. That accounts for the absence of beauty in English ships, which even to this day possess varying degrees of ugliness, but no beauty. For, though they make models today, the mere making of them does not suffice. The art and appreciation of model making must be instinctive.

The French and Spanish from the earliest times made beautiful ships and models, and when one of these ships fell into the hands of the English they adopted and used her if possible, or if she was too much damaged they took her apart, piece by piece, and built a new ship like her by copying the exact shape of each part of her in new material. Curiously enough, we Americans have always made beautiful ships—well proportioned, artistic in every line, while satisfactory in an equal degree for all practical purposes.

A model is made in a way that seems queer to the average layman, who doubtless suspected that it was whittled into shape out of a block of wood, as we boys used to whittle our blocks at the age when all of us were shipbuilders. It is not done so. After an order has been received for a certain kind of ship the plans of it are drawn upon paper. Mr. Lewis Nixon, the famous constructor for the Cramps, tells me that very early in the process he makes a picture of the ship as he wants it to look, but though he does so others may not consider it essential.

At all events, apart from any drawing, the needed dimensions and lines are developed upon paper, and then the model is made, and the president of the company begins to take very active interest in the work. The model is made in the shape of a block, formed of a number of pieces of wood glued together. These pieces represent the different curves of one side of the ship, from the keel to the gunwale—the different water lines is how the builders express it. To understand this the reader must imagine a ship made of solid wood. Imagine that cut in half lengthwise, and then imagine one half laid on its side and cut into slices.

The pen and ink calculations and plans produce the shape of the ship, and from these it is possible to obtain the outline and dimensions of every slice or plane between the bottom and the top. Each plane is measured and drawn in outline on a board, and the outline is dented or cut in the board with a sharp tool. All the boards or pieces of wood are then glued together, and a simple looking block is made—a block that shows nothing of its true nature except that the top of it bears the graven outline of the top deck or gunwale line of a ship. Out of that simple square block will come the egg which is to hatch the splendid ship that is to be.

That block, made up of slices, each with its dented outline of a different plane of the ship, is now cut away, much as we boys used to cut our block, but with this difference: Each board is cut exactly to the dented or graven line upon its surface. The shape the block will have when all the superfluous wood is cut away will be the model of the ship that was designed by the engineer on paper to fill the requirements of the customer's order, but will that model stand? Will the master builder be satisfied with its lines?

Will it do to be enlarged in steel and sent around the world as an example of what the Cramps consider the most beautiful and artistic and useful shape such a ship should have? No. Such a first model next to never suits the modeler, who in this case is Mr. Charles H. Cramp. He hacks into it with fervor. He tapers the bow. He digs away the stern. He shaves the whole model with the nice and dainty touches of a sculptor at work upon a statue on which is to rest his boast that he is a true artist.

The fate of the wooden block alters the figures of the engineer's plans. Perhaps the alteration is such that new drawings and a new model follow. Thus, by borrowing and lending, the two soon agree, and upon the two—the model and the plans—the ship will be built. Sometimes a model is on the scale of a quarter of an inch to each foot of the ship, but the scale differs with different builders.—Harper's Weekly.

Saved by a Dog's Bark.

The noise made by a dog saved several persons from being burned to death in a fire which broke out in Brooklyn on a recent morning. A woman was awakened by the yelping of a dog and found the whole place in flames. She roused her husband and children, and inside of five minutes after they were out of the house the building was a mass of flames.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, MAY 25 1894

Juries of late have come to the conclusion that an occasional conviction subserves the purposes of justice. There have been several instances recently, where "hung juries," though they were confidently expected, failed to materialize, to the discomfiture of criminals and the gentry who have ordinarily what is termed a "pull" One of these cases was in the East and the other in California. One was in the instance of a wholesale poisoner and the other was where a California tough thought he was privileged to cut the throat of a courtesan. It was John Wilkes who said that the very worst use to which you could put a man was to hang him. In the case of such wholesale poisoners like Dr. Meyers we doubt the wisdom of this clever bon mot, although the jury in his case seemed to have sympathized with the aphorism, as they brought the wretch in guilty of murder in the second degree, which means only imprisonment for life. Dr. Meyers seems to have had a strain of the Borgias in him.

Without any exaggeration, it is becoming a downright wonder that people continue to live in the East who can get away. What with floods and cyclones life there is not only uncomfortable but perilous in the extreme. When to all is added the excessive heat and cold, the electrical outbursts and general demoralization of nervous tissue, the region east of the Rocky Mountains is rapidly losing all the attractiveness it formerly possessed as a place of residence. In those portions of the East where natural gas has been most abundant the electrical storms have become positively terrifying, and Southern California owes to this cause alone many of her inhabitants. A section which is free from sunstrokes and cyclones, where hydrophobia is unknown and where nature always appears in an equable mood, presents attractions to strangers that will become stronger every day.

The Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser uses the recent affray in that city between Messrs. Bragg and Naeftel, in which both were shot on the streets, as the text for a sermon upon the evils of carrying deadly weapons upon the person. It is quite right when it says that "two families are broken up and two lovely home desolated in obedience to a custom whose antiquity only equals its brutality." The Advertiser speaks correctly in this matter. The habit of carrying revolvers and of using them on occasions when a few well directed words would have averted a personal collission is what is retarding the progress and development of the new south. If these affrays were confined to the "moonshiner" element they would create no special astonishment; but when the participants are men filling the highest social stations reasonable people in other parts of the union will think, and continue to think, that such a country is a very good one to avoid.

There is serious talk of a San Francisco rebellion against the Southern Pacific Railroad. At present the movement is confined to a street railroad, but it is likely to spread. If Mr. Sutro and a few other citizens can build a cable road from Central avenue to the ocean beach, which will transfer with roads running to the Market street wharf, why may not other citizens put a little money in a road from Stockton to Bakersfield? There is every prospect now that the Panama route will be kept open, and if by chance it should be closed the Mexican route will be open before the valley route can be finished. The commencement of the valley road would encourage the Panama people to maintain their independence, as a large increase of trade would result from the construction of the valley road.

It is to be hoped that the sugar investigation will be probed to the bottom. There is not in either house of congress a more incorrupible or truthful man than Senator Coke of Texas. That gentleman arose in the senate and stated that some of his fellow senators were speculating in the securities of the sugar trust at the same time they were legislating on sugar. He even offered to name the men who were disgracing their official trusts, and was prevented from doing so by fellow-senators. It is a great pity that the Texan was restrained. His revelation would have created a sensation and been of great benefit to the public.

Arctic Iciness.

It is fearfully cold over the line of Alaska on the edge of the Rocky mountains. Last winter the thermometer was for a week at a time down to 60 degrees, and I have seen it go even considerably lower. At no time in the winter, nor during other winters that I have been there, was it higher than 40 degrees. This cold is excruciating. We lived in a solid log house, a good warm one, but many a time I have awakened in the night and found the blankets, which were kept up well under the nose, frozen into a cake of ice. Sometimes the intense cold cakes the blankets for a long distance down.

Meats and everything froze, and you would throw them anywhere without thinking. The worst experience was trying to make bread. The yeast would freeze in spite of you, oftentimes even when the greatest care was exercised. If you stepped out, everything was so still and so intensely cold you could hear yourself breathe. It had a rustling sound.

I discovered a queer thing about the cold, and it was this: Below 40 degrees you didn't notice it any more than 40 degrees. It might go to 60 degrees, or even more, but it made so little difference that you didn't notice it. It was all practically the same to you.—San Francisco Examiner.

A Colossal Rock Camel.

One of the most curious and interesting formations in rock in the world is to be seen a short distance east of the stage road between Tucson and Oracle, and stands on a knoll several feet above the surrounding sand hills.

When first seen, we are told, the effect is startling, and the mind has to get over the shock before the peculiar object can be comprehended. It is a most perfect representation of a camel and is formed of one piece of granite. This curiosity is of colossal size, but perfectly proportioned. It is about 60 feet high and is very white and smooth. There are very few fissures on the surface, and they, strangely, are in the proper places to form features. The only real projection from the surface is exactly placed for an eyebrow. The two humps are plainly to be seen, and the neck is curved beautifully.

Perhaps some of the first discoverers of the sphinx in modern times attributed its authorship to an upheaval of the earth's crust, but everybody in this age knows better. As mediaeval man has been traced to Arizona and his methods and implements discovered there in profusion, why should we say that every curious formation bearing the image of some beast or other thing was not his work a thousand years or more ago?—Salt Lake News.

Got the Sparrows Tipsy.

The English sparrows have proved a nuisance in the cotton country, for as soon as the bolls open they pick out the cotton and carry it off, and some planters have lost, as they claim, hundreds of pounds in this way. There is one man, however, on the Mississippi that has not lost much. When he found the sparrows were committing depredations, he procured a quantity of wheat, soaked it in sweetened whisky and strewed it along the rows. The sparrows found it and thought they had a picnic.

So they had, but in 15 or 20 minutes there was the tipsiest lot of English sparrows ever seen on the face of this earth. They rolled about on the ground, falling on their sides and backs and kicking their heels into the air like a parcel of drunkards, all the while uttering the most comical squeaks. They did not have long to squeak, however, for the boys gathered them up and threw them into bags. The first day they gathered two bushels of drunken sparrows. Three or four days later the experiment was repeated with almost equal success, and from time to time since. They made excellent potpie, but the survivors have evidently come to regard the plantation as hoodooed, for now very few come about it.—St. Louis Exchange.

George I and the Stage.

George I was a lover of the stage, and, as his predecessors had done, caused his "servants" to play before him at court. In 1718 his majesty ordered the great hall of Hampton court to be converted for the time into a theater. There, under the direction of Steele, "whose political services had been poorly recompensed by granting him some theatrical privileges," seven performances were given. Among the plays were "Hamlet," "Sir Courtly Nice," "The Constant Couple," "Love For Money," "Volpone" and "Rule a Wife and Have a Wife." Among the players were Colley Cibber, Pinkethman, Johnson, Thurmond, Booth, Mills, Mrs. Porter and Mrs. Younger.

In former times the fee paid by the sovereign to his servants for a play acted at Whitehall had been £20. For these plays at Hampton court, King George, besides paying the actors their ordinary day's wage and traveling expenses, gave £350, and added £200 for the managers. The players were required to act at any time upon receiving a day's notice.—Gentleman's Magazine.

Victoria Abhors Tobacco.

Queen Victoria is perhaps the only European sovereign who has a positive aversion to tobacco in all its forms. Woe be to the prince who pollutes the apartments at Windsor with its fumes! Her ministers, too, must be careful. On more than one occasion telegrams have been returned to her foreign secretary with a note from her majesty's private secretary requesting that they be purified, and that in future they may not smell as villainously of tobacco smoke, for her majesty has her ancestress Elizabeth's aversion to "an evil smell."—Exchange.

White House Babies.

The five children besides Baby Esther Cleveland who were born in the White House were also girls. One of these girls, the grandchild of a president, is now employed in one of the departments in Washington, ending, as she began, her days under the government's roof tree.—Harper's Bazar.

A QUAINT CEREMONY.

A Wedding Which Was Conducted In Accordance With Quaker Rites.

At noon, in the prim meeting house of the Society of Friends at Rutherford place and Fifteenth street, Miss Elizabeth Willets and Dr. Samuel W. Lambert married themselves. No minister officiated, for none was needed. No gravers were said, and no music greeted their approach to the altar. Ceremony and display were lacking.

Half an hour before the ceremony was to take place the little meeting house was crowded to the walls. Three thousand invitations had been sent out, but only about 400 could gain entrance.

Everything had a subdued character—the pews painted in soft yellowish brown colors, the ceremony, the decorations and the people. No flowers were displayed, but the rostrum and the choir seats were banked with a mass of palms. Especially noticeable among the people were the young women, clad in soft colored cloth gowns, wearing big hats, which drooped in unexpected turns and crept out over their foreheads and had soft veils twisted about the brims, which shaded the eyes and the brows. These young women as they entered kept their eyes right toward the pews where they were going to sit. Scattered among the crowd pressing into the church came a few Friends dressed in their old time attire—wearing smooth black coats, with velvet faced standing collars and broad topped lapels, and broad crowned, wide brimmed black hats.

Miss Willets reached the church, accompanied by her father, shortly before noon. A few minutes later the ushers led the procession up the aisle. Following were the two bridesmaids. The bride advanced leaning on her father's arm. She wore a white satin gown trimmed with point lace and a tulle veil. The bridesmaids were attired in delicate green and white striped gowns, made with full skirts and adorned with black velvet bows.

The procession was received at the rostrum by Dr. Lambert and his best man and Dr. J. W. Markoe. Dr. Lambert advanced and took Miss Willets by the right hand. They stood facing each other, scarcely looking at their assembled friends, as Dr. Lambert said:

"In the presence of the Lord and these, my friends, I promise to take thee to be my wedded wife, promising through divine assistance to be a faithful and affectionate husband till death."

Then Miss Willets spoke a few hurried words, inaudible to the people. What she said was:

"In the presence of the Lord and my friends I promise to take thee to be my wedded husband, promising through divine assistance to be a faithful and affectionate wife until death."

No prayer was offered, but after a moment's pause Mr. Howard J. Wright, the white haired clerk of the meeting, unrolled a large certificate. Dr. and Mrs. Lambert walked a step or two to the left, where he was standing, and then seating himself in a chair Dr. Lambert signed his name to the certificate. Then Mrs. Lambert signed the document, writing not her maiden name, but her new name.

Then Mr. Wright stood up and read the certificate, which recounted that on the 21st day of October the two parties in the presence of witnesses had pledged themselves to be husband and wife. To this certificate is appended a list of witnesses giving testimony that the ceremony was performed. The marriage is recorded in the birth, marriage and death book of the society.—New York Letter.

HE PRIZES THE BANDAGE.

The Life of a Young Man Saved by the Petticoat of a Fair Texan.

Arthur Kauffman, a young Memphian who was in the wreck on the Wabash road, arrived home with his head bound up in a bloody white bandage, which he regards as his most precious possession. He says gold and jewels couldn't buy that strip of cloth. Kauffman says that when the collision came something hit him, and he lost consciousness. When he regained his senses, he was lying beside the wreck of the car, bleeding copiously from a deep cut on the head and unable to help himself. Just as he was about to faint again from weakness, an awfully pretty girl came up and epied him. She was Miss Taylor of Jefferson, Tex., who had escaped injury in the wreck.

She realized at once that the young man would bleed to death if not attended to. Without a moment's hesitation she whipped off her petticoat and tearing out a strip bound it tightly on Kauffman's head. The bleeding was checked and his life saved. To say that he feels deeply grateful to the fair Texan would be drawing it very mildly, and he vows he will keep the bandage as long as he lives.—Memphis Cor. St. Louis Republic.

Did the Queen Know?

Newspapers here recently announced with a great display of type that the queen had been graciously pleased to present many bottles of wine to various London hospitals for the use of poor patients. The same papers have carefully refrained from giving currency to the report published in reputable provincial journals to the effect that most of the wine in question was the refuse of the royal cellars and unfit for use in hospitals. It was in very bad condition. Many of the bottles were half empty, and others were so badly corked that the contents had turned sour. It is charitably suggested that her frugal majesty was ignorant of these defects.—New York Sun's London Letter.

Wheat Production.

A visitor in Washington at present is Ivan Ottlik of Buda-Pesth, councilor in the royal Hungarian ministry of agriculture. His journey to America is for the purpose of investigating American agricultural economics. He has traveled largely in the west and believes that our farmers are overproducing wheat and that this course is also exhausting the soil.—Washington Dispatch.

THE DIAMOND DOLLAR

THE FASCINATING MYTH CONNECTED WITH THE COIN OF 1804.

It Is Declared to Be a Fake, as the Government Never Issued Such a Coin—Other Instances of Curious Fraud Practiced Upon Collectors.

A sprucely dressed young fellow, with an air of badly suppressed excitement walked into a secondhand book store and curio shop on Marietta street Saturday night and laid a silver dollar on the show case.

"What is that worth?" he said to the proprietor.

The man behind the counter examined the coin with an imperturbable countenance. "One dollar," he replied.

"But, man alive!" almost screamed the visitor. "Don't you see the date?"

"Certainly. It's 1804."

The visitor fumbled in his pocket and produced a pamphlet. "Read that," he said, opening it and putting his finger on a certain page. The paragraph he indicated ran as follows:

"The dollar of 1804, the 'diamond dollar,' as it is familiarly termed, is the rarest of all American coins. A very limited number were struck from the dies, and only four are known to be in existence. One is owned by the British museum, one by Mr. E. L. Carpenter, a collector of Boston; one by the Illinois Historical society, and one by Mr. V. Herbert of Roanoke, Va. The last one sold was bid in for $1,500."

The dealer read this deliberately and assumed a tired expression.

"That is pure bosh," he said. "In the first place there is no such thing as an 1804 dollar. I mean a genuine one. Of course there are plenty of dollars with 1804 on them, but it was not put there by the mint. If Mr. Herbert of Roanoke or anybody else ever paid $1,500 for such a coin, they were done to the tune of exactly $1,499. There are eight 1804 dollars right here in Atlanta besides this one. Two are in Mr. Abe Fry's safe. Mr. Ed Brown has four and Mr. Williams two. I would bet that there are at least 50 of them in the state of Georgia. Some of the owners know that they are fakes, and some fondly believe that they have a treasure."

"And you say that the government never coined them?" gasped the visitor.

"I do. I made special inquiry at the United States treasury department at Washington and was informed that no dollars were issued that year. In the collection of coins there, which is of course complete, there is no 1804 dollar. I know that the myth is widespread, but it is a myth all the same. It was started by unscrupulous dealers, and there is a regular factory in New York for running out these dollars. They simply change the date on an 1807 or an 1809 dollar, both of which are comparatively common. They are then sold by private agents. If they were posted in the catalogues for public sale, the fraud would be quickly denounced, but they are worked off on collectors who think they are getting a snap."

The young man sighed and put his dollar in his pocket. "There must be a good deal of fraud of that kind practiced," he said.

"Yes," replied the dealer, "there is. Take for instance the Greenville (Ala.) 5 cent Confederate stamp. No such a stamp was ever issued, yet you can buy them by the hundred. They bring all the way from $1 to $25. The $1,000 Confederate bill is another example. There were exactly seven of these printed, and the plate was then destroyed. It's a long story, but that is the gist of it. One is in the British museum, one in the Astor library at New York and the others are owned by individuals throughout the country, a specimen, by the way, being here in Atlanta. Now, I have had dozens of these bills offered me for sale. There are thousands in collections over the world all spurious, every one of them. In fact the fraud practiced in that line would fill a volume."

After the young man went out considerably crestfallen, a reporter, who had overheard the conversation, asked whether there were really many American coins that brought very fancy prices.

"Yes," said the dealer. "Quite a number. There is the 1853 quarter without the arrowheads and rays. The quarter with both of these devices on it is common, but without them is exceedingly scarce and worth several hundred dollars. A very rare coin is the 1803 half penny, but recently several thousand of them were found in Ohio, and the price has dropped to next to nothing.

"Most people," he continued, "labor under the impression that a coin is valuable simply because it is old. Consequently they will hoard up old pennies, nickels and silver pieces that are really only worth their face value. The premium on a coin is not fixed by its age but by its scarcity. How do coins become scarce? Heaven only knows! It is a great mystery. There are instances of coinage of about equal volume on two consecutive years where specimens from one are as plentiful as blackberries and the other as scarce as hen's teeth. Nobody can explain it—we simply know that it is so. The mysterious disappearance of people which we occasionally read about is not half the enigma that this disappearance of money is. It vanishes from circulation, melts apparently into thin air, and all the fancy prices and big premiums of collectors never succeed in bringing it to life again."—Atlanta Constitution.

Ears and Character.

You never saw a poet or a painter with large, coarse ears that stand out from the head like extended wings. That kind of an auricular appendage betokens coarseness of mind. A long, narrow ear that lies flat to the head is a sign of pugnacity. Never trust a man with a thin, waferlike ear. He was born a hypocrite, if not a thief. A very small ear betokens a trifling mind, lacking decision. Ears set very high on the head indicate narrowness of mind. A large, well shaped ear that does not spread itself to the breeze is indicative of generousness. Most of the world compellers had large ears and well developed noses. Although there are so many millions of people in the world, no two pairs of ears are alike. Each has a marked individuality.—New York Recorder.

THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

His Various Robes, His Chains and Mace and Swords of State.

The fountain of municipal honor in England undoubtedly springs from the Guildhall, London, which justly claims to be accounted the most ancient of our municipal halls, seeing that the lord mayors of the last eight centuries are, with justice, assumed to have had prototypes in the Roman prefect and the Saxon fortreye or portgrave.

For a considerable number of years the robes of the lord mayor, the court of aldermen and the common councilors have been settled with a precision that none save the most reckless of innovators would presume to disturb. The lord mayor himself has his "gold" robe for the occasion of the annual Guildhall banquet and for the times when he proceeds in state either to the new law courts or to the houses of parliament. The aldermen have their scarlet gowns, the sheriffs their distinctive and very handsome robes and chains, while the common councilors rejoice in gowns called "mazarines," it being generally understood that mazarine is a term for a particular dark blue color, although, according to some lexicographers, mazarine also means a drinking vessel and an old way of dressing fowls.

Then, again, when the sovereign comes into the city the lord mayor is bound to don a robe of crimson or purple velvet trimmed with ermine. At the time of this investiture he wears a massive gold chain, but when he is honored by reelection at the expiration of his term of office he wears two chains. The mace of silver gilt, surmounted by a royal crown and the imperial arms, is carried before the mayor by the authority of the charter of Edward III. While the city possesses no less than four swords, one called the "Pearl," presented by Queen Bess when she opened the first royal exchange, and so called from its being richly set with pearls. This sword precedes the chief magistrate on all occasions of rejoicing and festivity. The sword of state is carried before the lord mayor as an emblem of his sovereignty within the city proper. The "black" sword is used on fast days in Lent and at the death of any member of the royal family, while the fourth sword is that placed close to the lord mayor's chair at the central criminal court.—London Telegraph.

Philosophy of Lamination.

One of the most interesting contributions to practical science has been made by Professor Tyndall in respect to cleavage, or lamination, his researches proving that any material, no matter how plastic or how homogeneous it may be, has within it the condition or the development of cleavage, and that the only external condition necessary to produce lamination is a sufficient degree of pressure exerted in one direction upon the mass. The resulting planes of cleavage will be at right angles with the direction in which the pressure is applied. The philosophy of this effect, as explained, lies in the fact that, as relates to the cohesion of the particles, no substance is strictly homogeneous—that is, the particles, granules or molecules of substances do not possess cohesive power equally in all directions; consequently, when pressure is applied to them, they slide over each other—the sliding surfaces being those of least cohesive power—and move toward a point of less pressure. In the case wherein pressure is applied in one direction only, the sliding will be in a direction at right angles with the direction of the pressure, and thus plates, laminæ or strata, are generated in the mass, the limiting faces of these layers having less cohesion than their interior parts.

Misunderstood.

Tired and hungry, a traveler whom we may call Mr. Smith entered a village inn and ordered a roast chicken. He sat down by the fire and took great comfort in watching the fowl roasting on the spit and in thinking how fine the flavor would be. It was nearly done when a strange looking individual entered the kitchen. His costume was eccentric, but it was undoubtedly that of a great personage.

To the innkeeper he said with an impatient, and, as it seemed to hungry Mr. Smith, an insufferably haughty air, "Well, William, will that chicken be roasted soon?"

"Sir," said Mr. Smith sternly, "that chicken is mine! I ordered it before you."

"What is that to me?" cried the personage harshly.

"What is that to you?" cried Mr. Smith, faint with hunger and just indignation.

Then the intruder spoke again and more gently. He said: "You see, sir, I want the turnspit chain to complete my costume. I am going to represent the Black Prince in an entertainment at the town hall this evening."—Youth's Companion.

False Ideas of the Arabian Horse.

Colonel Dodge brushes away many cherished illusions concerning the Arabian horse in a magazine article on the subject. He asserts that, while the exceptional Arabian is a fine fellow, he does not think that the best Arabian—aside from a certain attractiveness—is nearly as good as the best hunter, the best trotter, the best racer or the best saddle horse of England or America. "And I am quite sure," adds this accomplished horseman, "that I would stake my money on 100 bronchos of the American plains against 100 Arabians of the Syrian desert on a pull of 100 or 200 miles under conditions fair to each." The average Arabian, he notes, is so small as to be useless for any but light performance.—Pittsburg Times.

Why Mr. Astor Is Proud.

Mr. William Waldorf Astor is the proud possessor of the black pug dog Man Friday, having just purchased that distinguished animal from Mr. R. Mortivals of Takeley, Essex, at a big price. Man Friday is described by connoisseurs as very handsome, with a most perfect jet black coat. Black pugs are very rare and extremely quaint, and Mr. Astor believes he is the only American who possesses a specimen of the breed.—London Letter.

The Tarantula.

The sting of the tarantula (a name derived from Taranto, a town in Italy), the most venomous of spiders, was popularly supposed to produce a disease called "tarantism," which could be cured only by music or dancing, and the dance which cured it was called "tarantella." You can see the peasants dance the tarantella now, but without waiting for spider bites.—St. Nicholas.

BLANEY—KISPERT—At Georges Creek, May 23, 1894, by Rev. J. W. Albona, Mr. Joseph R. Blaney and Miss Sarah E. Kispert.

R. Hession of Big Pine visited Independence during the week.

P. H. Mack Esq. arrived home from a visit to Los Angeles last Monday.

The Republican County Central Committee meets at Independence to-day.

Robert McPherson, of Orange county, arrived at Independence last Tuesday.

Robert O'Neal of Bishop visited Independence and vicinity early in the week.

Irv. H. Mulholland has received his commission as Register of the Land Office at Independence.

The Reno Gazette says that owning to late frosts the Nevada fruit crop will be an entire failure.

Supervisor Wilson spent a couple of days in town this week, returning to Lone Pine yesterday.

Ed. Walker and W. T. Grant came up from Olancha early in the week, returning last Tuesday.

A. W. D. Carroll left Independence last Tuesday morning for a trip to San Francisco and the Big Fair.

J. A. McKenzie and T. C. Boland were in town last Saturday, returning to Lone Pine the same evening.

J. Y. Ashmore came down from Big Pine yesterday with a load of lumber to be used in this road district.

S. G. Sneden Esq. came down from Bishop on Wednesday and has since been busy on Superior Court matters.

Hon. John Carmichael, having completed his inspection of the Land Office at Independence, went north on last Tuesday's train.

W. H. Walker has been in town for the past two weeks, and will remain for some time longer, looking after the collection of sheep license.

R. W. Thomas of Big Pine arrived home last Monday from a visit to the Mid-winter Fair and other points of interest west of the mountains.

J. J. Gunn came in from the Minnietta yesterday. He has closed the mine down for the summer, leaving one man in charge of the property.

Prospects are favorable in this vicinity for the heaviest fruit crop in several years, and owing to the great loss in Nevada there will be a good market.

Mrs. John E. Jones Jr. came down from Round Valley on Wednesday and is visiting with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Walter, at Camp Independence.

The Independence baseball club has received a lot of handsome new suits. The uniform is black with white caps and the word "Independence" in large white letters across the breast.

F. E. Densmore Esq. arrived home on Wednesday from Benton where he and District Attorney Forbes had been engaged in a land contest case. Mr. Forbes is expected home on Monday.

The footrace at Los Angeles last Saturday between Morris and Pulley was won by the latter in a fraction less than 10 seconds. The Santa Ana sports lost a lot of money by the defeat of Morris.

W. H. Bradley arrived at Independence last Monday. He spent Tuesday looking at mines in the vicinity of Independence and went to Fish Springs on Wednesday. Mr. Bradly will visit the Darwin country and other points in Southern Inyo before returning to Los Angeles.

WILL SETTLE IT LEGALLY.

Chalfant is like the old woman who was sent to the bottom of a well shrieking out "scissors!" His last screed is simply a repetition of falsehoods and billingsgate, calling for no reply. In his first article he consigned me to the nether regions, and calling bad names and making faces behind a wall has been the tenor of each succeeding article. With all due reverence I will say that if heaven is made up of his kind of people I would rather be somewhere else. In a sermon at Bishop some eight years ago Bishop Fowler said: "I would rather reign a king in hell than be a shining puppet around the throne." Those who have read Scott's beautiful tale "The Fair Maid of Perth," will remember that the heart of the hero had been exchanged at his birth for that of a white doe, making him a coward for life. In Chalfant's case the nearest resemblance is to a coyote; he has all the cunning and destructive tendencies of that unclean beast, together with its cowardice. In his last article he makes a false statement and backs it up with a column of proof. While the column of proof may be correct enough the false premises renders it all abortive. It was never represented to the Board by me, or by any other person, that registration should not close fifteen days before election. That matter was incidentally discussed after the contract had been awarded and the Board adjourned, as before stated. I made no argument or representation to the Board of Supervisors concerning the Great Register contract. By permission of the Chairman asked and given before Chalfant's bid was opened I called their attention to the advertised call for bids and requested that they ask for Mr. Parker's opinion, he being a pratical printer, which was done, and they acted upon it. All this I can prove by any member of the Board of Supervisors, but preferably by Supervisor Love, as he is Chairman of the Board. The Board in this case used the same right as they did in the matter of the County Hospital any many other cases, of accepting a higher bid if in their judgment it was serving the best interests of the County so to do. In this case, as in other instances, Chalfant made use of the columns of the Register to vent a personal spleen or to forward a private interest. His object in this instance was to remove a political rival from his path and injure me in the matter of any future business I might have with the Board of Supervisors. He made base insinuations concerning me and mine and when confronted with the certain consequences of any lie he might utter, his craven spirit quailed. It will be observed that in his various tirades he has failed to prove one thing against my character, which the venom he has displayed throughout would have led him to do if such a thing were possible. A careful review of the entire matter brings nothing further to my mind that need be said. If he chooses, like a querulous old woman, to go on crying "scissors!" that is his affair. Only this much, if he persists in his falsehoods I will carry the matter into the courts, where a definite settlement can be had.

IRV. H. MULHOLLAND.

Fourth of July.

An adjourned meeting of citizens was held at the Pavilion Tuesday evening and reports of committees were received. Cash receipts amounting to $196.50 was reported by the Finance Committee, together with free advertising by the INDEPENDENT and Index. The various committees on games, baseball and entertainment reported progress and asked for further time. That the celebration will be a rousing success is now assured. As soon as a programme is decided upon it will be published in this paper.

Thanks are due Mrs. J. Brown for a tray of strawberries of the Glendale variety grown on her place at Georges Creek. The berries are fully as large as any we have seen in the San Francisco markets and of far superior flavor. Owens Valley fruits of all kinds surpass in flavor those grown near the Coast, the reason being mainly due to our warm, dry atmosphere.

While a number of children were playing on the street in front of the Norman House on Wednesday a little Indian boy was run over by a passing team. While the little fellow was not seriously injured he might have been killed, and his mishap will serve as a warning to the children to seek another playground.

Detective Len Harris, who was shot at Boulder Station, California, died of his wounds at the home of his son-in-law in Alameda. He was a native of New York, aged 66 years. He was elected Sheriff of Sacramento county in 1856. Azoff, who shot him, is in custody; he is a Russian by birth and by trade a painter.

Of late would-be Boss Craig has been very busy fixing up a slate for the Republican party of Inyo county. It remains to be seen whether that party will be dictated to by him or by anybody. In the words of the old song, "Maybe it will, but I doubt it."

Louis Josephs, accompieand by his wife and child, went to Big Pine yesterday, where they expect to make their future home. Mr. Josephs will conduct a general merchandising business in the building south of the Big Pine hotel.

Supervisor Fitzgerald arrived from Modock on Tuesday. He spent a couple of days in town and went to Lone Pine yesterday. Mr. Fitzgerald has recently struck a good body of ore at Modock and will soon be making shipments.

Pat. Clinton came up from Cerro Gordo on Tuesday, returning next day. He had met with a very painful accident, having run a large splinter entirely through the ball of his right thumb and came up for the purpose of having it removed.

D. C. Lane arrived at Keeler last Sunday evening on his way to Darwin from a visit to Los Angeles. Mr. Lane is now sole owner of the Sorba mine, having recently purchased the interest of his partner, L. B. Ely.

Mrs. John Fiehman and her little son came up from Keeler on Tuesday's train. The little fellow is receiving medical treatment. Mr. Fiehman came up from Keeler yesterday to attend the Odd Fellows lodge.

The assessment notice of the Con. Virginia Co. would seem to indicate a resumption of activity in the Kearsarge Mining District.

A Bear Fight Without Bloodshed.

Alexander Wallace, who looks after the campground on Boone's mountain, which is kept up for the convenience and comfort of hunting and fishing parties, had an exciting experience with a bear a few days ago. He started out with an ax on his shoulder to find a bee tree, and when about a mile from camp, while in a dense laurel thicket, through which his course led him, he ran onto a couple of bear cubs. They immediately set up a howl of distress and a moment later the old mother bear came running to their rescue with her mouth wide open.

Wallace raised his ax to strike, but it caught in the laurel bushes with which he was thickly surrounded, and the blow which the bear received was only sufficient to aggravate her. She opened her mouth a foot or two wider, so that Wallace said he could see clear into her stomach, and tried to get Wallace between her jaws. But he kept striking at her with the ax in his cramped position until one of the cubs, which in the meantime had run away, began to whine in a pitiful way, when the old bear turned around and ran off, apparently thinking its offspring had gotten into new danger. Thus the fight ended without bloodshed on either side. Wallace was very willing to quit, and straightway proceeded to make himself scarce in that quarter.—Punxsutawney Spirit.

A Libel on a Fair Town.

Down at Stonington, Conn., an enterprising justice of the peace has had himself appointed also "dog officer," which in Connecticut legal terminology means the officer whose duty it is to collect the dog tax. The penalty for failing to pay the tax is seven dollars or thirty days in jail, or both. The Stonington officer has adopted a peculiar method to facilitate justice. Every morning a carriage starts out; it is the courtroom on wheels. There are in it the grand juror, the constable and the dog officer and justice of the peace. A call is made upon one of the unfortunates. He is summoned to appear at the carriage; the writ is served and the case is tried. Result—the defendant is fined seven dollars and costs, amounting to about fifteen dollars. Of this amount the grand juror receives three dollars, the constable two dollars and the dog officer three dollars. In addition to this, each man collects ten cents per mile for traveling expenses. If the defendant makes a vigorous protest he is bound over to a future session of the court; but the result is invariably the same.—Buffalo Courier.

Bold Jackals.

The residents of Howrah have been finding lately that jackals are animals of anything but an attractive temper. In some cases they have come right up to the bungalows in search of prey. A little girl, aged about five years, was playing in a veranda when a jackal suddenly rushed on her and was dragging her away when she was rescued. She was severely bitten. Three natives, while walking along the Kooroot road, were attacked by a jackal, which was only driven off after a stubborn fight, and a tale is told of two women, while standing near a tank, being attacked and bitten. So serious has the state of matters become that the public propose to submit a memorial to the district magistrate praying for the adoption of measures for the destruction of these pests.—Pioneer Mail.

An Adventure with Turtles.

A boy at Newark, N. J., found two snapping turtles on Sunday morning and started to carry them home. In crossing a garden he was met by the owner, who poured out a volley of broken English upon the lad. The boy stood his ground bravely and returned vigorous language, but in doing so forgot all about the turtles and held one of them close to his bare leg. The turtle seized the lad by the left calf and held on with the tenacity of a bulldog. In writhing around the boy brought the other turtle in contact with his right leg, and he, too, took hold. The gardener forgot his anger and with the aid of his pruning knife managed to liberate the turtles from their hold. The muscles of both calves were badly lacerated.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Hydraulic Testing.

A plant for hydraulic testing purposes is to be installed near the town of Santhia, Italy. The proposed establishment is intended for the determination of many points at present more or less obscure in the flow of water through large sluices. It is to be located between the Cavour and the Cigliano canals, where the requisite volume of water for such experiments can be easily obtained, the Cigliano canal being elevated about 88½ feet above the Cavour canal. The preliminary plans provide for the construction of a large and small sluice, measuring basins and weirs, and accommodation for the testing of all kinds of hydraulic apparatus.—New York Telegram.

ONLY GIRL AT OVERLOOK

By FRANKLIN FYLES.

"Oh, have no alarm, Mees Warriner," and the man's facial expression softened singularly as he gazed wistfully at the girl, "I haf said I love-a you." Then, with a startling, quick transition, he glared menacingly off in the direction that Gerald Heath had gone. It seemed curious to Mary, too, that in his rage his English was clearer than usual, as he growled, "It is your lover that should be afraid of me." He flung out one fist in a fierce menace, and added in Italian: "Nel vindicarvi bisogna ch'egli mi rende la sua vita."

CHAPTER II.

But for an instant kept them prisoners.

The full moon looked for Mary Warriner's little house that night as soon as a clearance of the sky permitted, and then beamed down on her abode effulgently. But it was 11 o'clock before the gusty wind blew the thick clouds aside and let the orb illuminate Overlook. Back of the shed in which the telegrapher worked by day was a structure in which she slept at night. It was built of slabs, with big growing trees to form its irregular corners, and their lowest limbs contributed the rafters, while stripped bark and evergreen boughs made the roof. The foliage swayed above in the fitful wind, and covered the cabin and the grass around it with commingling, separating, capering shadows of leaves, as though a multitude of little black demons were trying to get to the slumberer within. Their antics looked spiteful and angry at first, but as the wind lessened to a breeze, and as the moon seemed to mollify them, they became frolicsome without malice, and at length, when the merest zephyrs impelled their motions, they gamboled lazily, good humoredly above and around the couch of Mary Mite.

It was midnight when a man shot into the open space around the cabin like a missile. He ran first to the front of the structure, where a tarpaulin curtained the shed for the night, and gazed for a moment blankly at this indication that the hour was not one of business. Tremendous haste was denoted in his every step and gesture. He plucked twice at the canvas as though to pull it down. Then he skurried around to the single window of Mary's apartment, whose only door opened into the shed, and pounded with his knuckles on the ill fitted sash, making it clatter loudly. Silence within followed this noise without.

"Hello! Wake up," he cried. "Don't fool for a minute. Wake up!"

There was no response, and he skipped to and fro in his impatience. He was an ordinary shoveler and pounder, with nothing to distinguish him from the mass of manual laborers at Overlook, but unlike the usual man with an errand at the telegraph station flourished a scrap of paper.

"I want to telegraph!" he shouted, and struck the window again. "Get up, quick! It's life and death!"

Mary Warriner was convinced that her services were urgently and properly required. She peeped warily out to inspect the man, estimated him to be merely a messenger, and then opened wide the sash, which swung laterally on hinges. Her delicate face bore the same sort of calm that characterized it during business hours, but the moon shone on it now, the hair had got loose from the bondage of knot and pin, and for an outer garment she was carelessly enwrapped in a white, fleecy blanket. The man did not give her time to inquire what was wanted.

"You're the telegraph girl, ain't you?" he exclaimed. "Well, here's something to telegraph. It's in a hurry, hurry, hurry. Don't lose a minute."

"I couldn't send it to-night," Mary said.

"You must!"

"It isn't possible. There is nobody at the other end of the line to receive it. The wire is private—belongs to the railroad company—isn't operated except in the daytime. You'll have to wait until to-morrow."

"To-morrow I'll be a hundred years old or else dead," the man almost wailed in despair.

"What?"

"I was only ten years old yesterday. To-night I'm sixty. To-morrow'll be too late. Here—here—send it to-night, miss. Please send it to-night."

The mystified girl mechanically took the piece of paper which he thrust into her hands, but her eyes did not drop before they discovered the insanity in his face, and when they did rest on the paper they saw a scrawl of hieroglyphics. It was plain that this midnight visitor was a maniac. Against Overlook's civil and sane men Mary had entrenched herself confidently behind her apathy, but within the round of the clock she had been beset by agreeable sentiment, by violent passion and now by irrational delusion. She screamed for help.

A watchman responded almost instantly to her call. He was a stalwart fellow, employed to guard the company's tools and machinery against mischief at night, and his patrol, since Mary inhabited the cabin, had brought him very frequently past the place. He chanced to have come almost there when he heard the outcry. Upon seeing the cause of the girl's fright he dropped all perturbation of his own and treated the incident as a matter of course. The lunatic wobbled like a drunken man about to collapse as he mumbled his request over and over again.

"Here now, Eph," the watchman said, with as much of cajolery as command, "you musn't bother the young lady. Ain't you ashamed to scare her this way. Get right out of this."

The watchman took the other by the arm, and as they started off—one insisting, one objecting—the official looked back to say, "He won't hurt nobody, Miss Warriner; he's just a little cranky, that's all."

Mary watched them out of sight, and while she was doing so Gerald Heath approached from the contrary direction. He had heard the girl's scream. Why he was within earshot he might not have been able to explain satisfactorily, for it was not his habit to take midnight walks, even when the air was so brightly moonlit and so temporarily fine; but if cross-questioned he would doubtless have maintained that he had sought only to escape from the darkness and closeness of his shanty quarters. Besides, where would he so likely wander in quest of good sight and breath as to the spot whence he could view the scenery which he in vain asked the railway company to exhibit to their passengers. As he turned the corner of the cabin he saw Eph and the watchman departing, and comprehended the disturbance.

"Eph has been frightening you, Miss Warriner," he said.

Mary screamed again, but this time it was a low, musical little outcry of modesty. She had not observed Gerald's approach. She clutched the blanket closely around her white throat, which had been almost as much exposed as by an ordinary cut of frock, and drew under cover the gleaming wrists which had all day been bared to a greater extent by sleeves of handy working length. Then she reached out one taper arm and swung the sash around on its hinges, so its inner covering of muslin made a screen between her and the visitor. He did not apologize for his intrusion, and she pouted a little, on her safe side of the sash, at his failure to do so.

"I see it was Eph that alarmed you," he said. "What did he do?"

She told him, and then asked, "Who is he, and what ails him?"

"He is a common laborer with an uncommon affliction," was the reply. "One day an excavation caved in and for an hour he was buried. Some timbers made a little space around his head, but the rest of him was packed in earth. He had breathed the inclosed air two or three times over, and was almost suffocated when we got him out. He was insensible. He never came back to his senses. He believes he is living at the rate of more than a year every hour. That is why he was in such a hurry with his imaginary message."

"Poor fellow!" came from the obverse side of the sash.

"Yes, poor fellow," the narrator assented. "I understood his hallucination at once. When a man is suddenly placed in mortal peril his past life dashes before him. Half drowned men afterward tell of reviewing in a minute the events of years. It is a curious mental phenomenon. Well, this poor chap had that familiar experience, but with a singular sequence. The impression that all his lifetime before the accident happened in a brief time has remained in his disordered mind. He believes that his whole earthly existence is condensed—that future years as well as his past ones are compressed into days, and his days into minutes. Nothing can disabuse him of this idea. Everything is to him ephemeral. That's why I named him Eph—short for ephemeral, you see. He doesn't remember his real name, and on the roll he had only a number. He has done his work well enough until within a few days, but now his malady seems to have turned to the worst. He has talked wildly of getting some physicians to check the speed of time with him, and it may have been that he wished to telegraph to this fancied expert."

"It is singular," Mary said, "and very sad."

The midnight incident seemed to have come to a conclusion. It was a proper time for Gerald to say good night and go away. He still stood on the opposite side of the half open sash, around the edge of which appeared a small set of finger tips, which pulled the screen a little closer, showing that the girl was minded to shut herself in. But a hand twice as big opposed hers, gently yet strongly, and in doing so it touched her, upon which she let go and the window flew open.

"Oh, you mustn't see me," Mary exclaimed, as Gerald got a vanishing glimpse of the white draped figure. "Good night."

Her Trust In Vaccination and Prayer.

Here is a little story, the incident being given to us during the smallpox period and when Winsted was buried in gloom. It happened when things were at the worst, and it occurred in the household of Mr. Benjamin Richards on John street. Mr. Richards has a little daughter, and she took it to heart quite forcibly because the churches were all closed, and so she dressed herself in some of her mother's clothes one Sunday morning, and perching upon the stairs proceeded to hold church services. The little tot was choir and soprano and preacher, all in one. After calling upon Mrs. Howe to sing a hymn, she personated the well known vocalist and sang, and then she did a little preaching, and then made a prayer. The prayer was short and was as follows:

"O Lord, make the smallpox go away. Don't let the smallpox get my papa, nor my mamma, nor me, nor any of us. O Lord, we've all been vaccinated, and it's working b-e-a-u-t-i-f-u-l-l-y on all of us; amen."

We are pleased to state that the prayer was answered, and that the little tot and all of her family came through the ordeal in good order.—Winstead Citizen.

Told of Edward Blake.

One day a near friend ventured to suggest to Mr. Blake that it would be politic to unbend a little—in short, to have more of Sir John's bon camaraderie. Mr. Blake listened, gentle and without vanity, as great men are apt to be, and said that he would willingly oblige if his friend would tell him how. The friend felt embarrassed. It was one thing to suggest a lack in a man, but another and wholly different thing to suggest a remedy. However, he would do his best. He urged upon the Liberal leader the necessity of a little jocoseness, a noticing of everyday affairs and not this constant absorption in great matters.

"Well," said Mr. Blake patiently.

"Well," replied his friend in despair, looking about for a moral to adorn his tale of advice and noting the fierce snowstorm blowing against the windows. "For instance, as you go to the house this afternoon you will be sure to meet some one you know battling along in the storm on Parliament hill, and he is equally sure to say something to you about the snowfall. That will be your opportunity. Say jauntily, 'Oh, that's snow matter,' and see how amused and pleased he will be."

Mr. Blake laughed, repeated to himself "That's snow matter" two or three times, and his candid friend felt that a beginning had indeed been made.

Later on Mr. Blake ventured out. As he crossed the plateau the snow whirled about his stalwart form and to sed freezing particles into his face all unheeded, for the statesman was deep in thought. Finally he bumped against a man walking in the opposite direction. It was a prominent member of his party.

"I beg your pardon," gasped the man. "I didn't see you, Mr. Blake, for the snow in my eyes. We are having sharp weather, are we not?"

"Oh!" said Mr. Blake, rousing and dimly feeling that this was his cue. "That's—that's—that's immaterial."—St. Louis Republic.

Better Not Eat in Hot Weather.

We all eat too much in the summer time. The man who begins a hot summer day with a cup of hot coffee, a big slice of beefsteak fried in grease, a cupful of boiled eggs and two or three hot doggy rolls fresh from the oven is simply firing up for the day. A glass of water, a few sips of coffee, a little fruit, a cracker and a glass of milk constitute all the breakfast that is needed for summer time in this climate, and during the intensely hot weather if a man eats meat once a day that is generally once too often.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

THE COMPLEXION OF A CHINESE

Is not yellower than that of an unfortunate individual whose liver complaint has assumed the chronic form. The eyeballs of the sufferer assume a saffron hue, there is dull pain in the region of the organ affected, the tongue is coated, breath sour, sick headaches usually but not always occur, and there is sometimes dizziness on arising from a sitting posture. Constipation and dyspepsia are also attendants of this very common ailment, always in its aggravated form, liable to breed abscesses of the liver, which are very dangerous. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters wholly eradicates it, as well as the troubles complicated with it and which it originates. In chills and fever, a complaint which always yields to the Bitters, the liver is seriously involved. This fine alterative tonic removes costiveness and indigestion, rheumatic, nervous and kidney trouble and debility.

THE GENUINE AND THE SHAM.

Every good thing has its host of imitators; every genuine article its counterfeits. The imitators always choose the most valuable and popular article to counterfeit, so that when they claim their sham to be equal, or as good, or the same as "So-and-So's," the public may depend upon it that "So-and-So's" article is the best of the kind.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER is the standard of excellence the world over, and imitators in their cry that theirs is "as good as ALLCOCK'S" are only emphasizing this fact and admitting "ALLCOCK'S" to be the acme of perfection, which it is their highest ambition to imitate. The difference between the genuine and these imitations is as wide as that between copper and gold.

The only safe way for purchasers is to always insist upon having ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER. It is the only perfect plaster ever produced.

MYSTERIOUS IRON.

Twin boys were born to a certain woman of the Sioux tribe in the midst of a terrific thunderstorm. In accordance with the old custom the children were named from this circumstance, after the deity or personification of thunder. The elder was called Shakes-the-earth-as-he-walks and the younger His-voice-is-heard-coming. They grew up to boyhood in close companionship, but at the age of about twelve years the elder brother fell sick and died. The other was for a time inconsolable, and he never ceased to communicate with the spirit of his brother, as though he were still upon the earth.

At an early age the youth announced his determination to go forth alone upon the warpath—a remarkable undertaking among the Dakotas, who seldom attempt a solitary expedition until they become experienced warriors. This feat was to be undertaken upon the advice of the elder twin, who had promised success to his younger brother if he would follow strictly his directions. The young man accordingly set out on foot upon his hazardous journey, carrying with him his gun and ammunition and several pairs of moccasins.

On the second day he shot a deer, and having cut out the tongue and heart for food offered the entire animal as a sacrifice to the thunder god, after the manner of his people. He stretched and pinned it to the ground by the four extremities, offered prayers for a safe and victorious return and then slept beside the embers of the fire. At dawn he resumed his journey toward the north.

After many days of wearisome traveling the wanderer discovered one morning in the distance a solitary tepee. It seemed to flicker white through the scintillating heat along the far horizon. He approached it more nearly. It proved to be a tent of skins tanned to a beautiful whiteness and painted with symbolic figures. A man and a woman were depicted at full length on either side of the doorway.

Cautiously the youth crept still nearer to the tent, but without detecting any sign of life in its neighborhood, save the presence of a horde of beautiful spotted ponies, which were grazing near by. No smoke issued from the aperture in the top, and not even a dog thrust his nose under the gayly tasseled door.

The young Indian accordingly concealed his body behind a tuft of sagebrush on a little eminence which commanded the mysterious tepee and scanned the horizon for the approach of its expected owner and the tent itself for the revelation of a possible inmate. If it should be occupied by a man and his wife only, the man would return at evening from the hunt and ere that time the woman would doubtless appear outside the tent. If several men were within, one or more of them might soon show themselves. Absolutely motionless he lay prone in the long grass and waited.

At last his patience was rewarded. The swinging door was pushed aside and from within there stepped a young and handsome woman. Her dress was of fine deerskins, elaborately embroidered, but of a fashion unlike that of the Sioux women; her jet black hair was arranged in two long plaits that fell over her shoulders and her features were the prettiest and most delicately formed that the delighted youth had ever beheld. Shading her eyes with her hand she gazed earnestly out along the horizon, as if expecting some one, and then retired once more within the tent.

Satisfied now that the woman was alone and her husband out following the deer or the buffalo, the young man rashly resolved to surprise the fair occupant of the solitary tent before the hunter's return. He stole as noiselessly as possible to the doorway and placed his hand upon the tasseled door, his heart beating violently meantime, partly from fear of the sudden approach of his unknown enemy and partly from his eagerness to see more nearly the charming face that had captivated his fancy.

Suddenly, with a last hurried glance over his shoulder, he flung the door aside and bent his plumed head to the low opening. His eyes fell instantly upon the woman, seated on a buffalo robe and embroidering a moccasin. She lifted her eyes at his unexpected entrance and greeted him with a charming smile, which greatly increased his confusion. "Surely," he thought, "this is an elk or deer in woman shape, or else one of the fairy sisters. Any mortal woman would scream at the sudden appearance of a stranger while alone and unprotected in her lodge."

"Who are you," he exclaimed, at last. "Are you a Dakota?"

The girl smiled again and shook her head.

"Where is your husband?" he asked.

She told him in the sign language that she understood not the Sioux tongue; that she was with her younger brother, who would soon return from his day's hunt. She also informed him that she was the daughter of a powerful chief, whose village was several days' journey to the north, and that on the third morning they would return thither.

After promising to come again when the brother was at home, the young warrior took his leave, with a lingering look behind him, which sufficiently announced to the girl the impression she had made.

He now resumed his watch from behind the tuft of sagebrush, and as the sun was near setting a rider appeared in sight, as a moving speck on the horizon. In a few minutes a handsome young man rode up to the lodge and dismounted from his pony. His sister immediately came out to meet him, released the body of the young doe from his saddle bow, removed saddle and bridle and watered and picketed the pony. She then followed her brother into the tent, from which a thin trail of smoke soon issued and lost itself in the blue air.

After they had supped the pair reappeared and seated themselves to enjoy the sunset and the cool of the evening. They held an animated conversation, accompanied by the most expressive gestures, all of which were closely observed by the unseen watcher, who concluded that the girl had said nothing to her brother concerning her mysterious visitor.

The night passed without incident, and the young Sioux watched the Blackfoot depart in the morning before presenting himself at the lodge of his beloved. She smiled archly as she saw him, and ceased her embroidery long enough to ask in the sign language, "Why did you not come, as you promised, before my brother left?" The artful youth responded with another question, "Why did you not tell your brother of my visit yestesday?" Upon this both laughed aloud and continued to converse with more freedom. The maiden exhibited her finely worked robes and other possessions, while she coyly took note meanwhile of the brilliant paint, unusual equipments and handsome face and form of the fascinating stranger.

Pointing to his gun, which was always within reach, she questioned him as to its use. Smiling at her ignorance he made signs expressive of its death dealing force, but she looked aside incredulously. Finally the youth boldly asked the maiden to become his wife and to accompany him home. She appeared to consent, but stipulated that he should first return with them to her father's lodge. To test her lover's faith she proposed also to conceal him in a large par fleche (rawhide trunk), there to await her brother's return. Although the young warrior fully realized that he was placing himself in a perilous and even humiliating position, for love's sake he submitted one evening to be crowded into the narrow space within one of these painted trunks, where he lay helpless and unable to move, breathing through a small opening which was turned toward the outer circumference of the lodge.

The hunter returned at the usual hour and was informed by his sister that a strange young man of another tribe had called at the lodge. She described vividly his fine appearance, splendid dress and the strange weapon he carried, but omitted to mention his proposal of marriage and his presence in the lodge. The concealed lover felt very uncomfortable as he listened to the conversation, not a word of which he could understand, and in spite of his passion he dreaded some perfidy on the part of the smiling Blackfoot maiden. He clutched his gun to his breast and lay still.

Darkness came on and all slept—the adventurous Sioux far from soundly, owing to anxiety and his cramped position. At daybreak the young hunter arose, saddled his pony and went out after deer, having agreed with his sister to return very early, and if possible to surprise the stranger in their lodge. Accordingly she released her lover as soon as she could and gave him an abundant breakfast, after which they sat talking for a long while, as they had a great deal to say to each other.

Suddenly the shadow of the Blackfoot darkened the doorway. The intruder did not betray his surprise by the slightest start, and the two young men cordially greeted one another and entered into conversation by means of signs. When the young Sioux presently announced his desire to make the maiden his wife and his intention of returning with them to the tribe on the morrow there was a silence.

"Friend," finally exclaimed the Blackfoot, "you will expose yourself to great danger by returning with us. My sister has many suitors among the young men of the tribe, and some one among them may be induced by jealousy to kill you."

The other smiled and pointed to his gun, saying in effect, "I am able to defend myself."

"What is the singular weapon?" demanded in surprise the Blackfoot.

The owner of the gun replied by asking him to set up a mark, which he would pierce at a distance much greater than that at which an arrow would prove effective. The Blackfoot offered the white pony which he usually rode, but was refused. A willow wand was thrust into the earth and instantly cloven by the bullet, greatly startling by the unaccustomed sight and sound both the youth and girl, the latter of whom now fancied that a supernatural being stood before her. The Sioux, however, by carefully explaining the mechanism of the wonderful gun and putting a few grains of powder on the fire, dispelled all superstitious fears.

The Blackfoot was now persuaded that the stranger was a personage whom it would be an honor to bring home as a guest. He therefore consented to the lover's proposition, only insisting that the youth must be concealed in a bundle of skins and conveyed secretly to the chief's house on a travois, lest he should lose his life by the rash action of some jealous brave. Accordingly they set out next morning at daybreak for the Blackfoot village, the adventurous Sioux, hidden in robes upon his rude conveyance, bringing up the rear. At nightfall on the second day they reached the village, and the chief welcomed them hospitably, only warning the stranger to beware of the disappointed suitors of his handsome daughter. In the morning the whole tribe was assembled to hear the announcement that the chief would give his daughter in marriage to a young warrior of another tribe. Here some hot headed youths were ready to fall upon their successful rival, but were held back by the chief and told of the wonderful weapon possessed by the stranger called the "mysterious iron."

The Sioux professed his readiness to meet them all and challenged them to a trial of its magical powers. Contemptuously and incredulously they offered their best ponies for a mark, and this time the offer of one was accepted. The Sioux fired and the beautiful animal leaped into the air and fell lifeless. Some of the people screamed, others fled and all were persuaded of the wonderful gifts of the stranger, who was believed by many to be an impersonation of the thunder.

The wedding was celebrated by feasting and gifts, and the triumphant youth carried home his beautiful bride and her dowry of many fine horses, laden with rich robes and ornaments. Soon after his return to his own people he gave a great feast, and upon this occasion distributed these presents among the tribe. Subsequently an equal number of horses, burdened with blankets, guns, knives, powder, beads and other articles obtained from the white men, were sent as a present to the Blackfoot chief.—Charles and Elaine Goodale Eastman in Philadelphia Press.

Animals That Delight to Play.

In animals the faculty of amusement awakes very early. Our four footed friends seem to be aware of this, and make it a part of their parental duties to amuse their young. A ferret will play with her kittens, a cat with hers, a dog with her puppies. A mare will play with her foal, though the writer has never seen a cow try to amuse her calf, nor any birds their young. If their mothers do not amuse them the young ones invent games of their own.—London Tit-Bits.

Ancient Sausages.

Antiquaries are baffled in their attempts to ascertain when sausages first became an article of human consumption. We know at least that among the ancient Greeks sausages, called "allantes" and "chordai," were a common article of diet; and every schoolboy knows, or ought to know, that sausages, black puddings and sausage sellers appear in the comedies of Aristophanes.—London Telegraph.

A SAILING SCENE.

A Sight on the Dock When a Big Ocean Steamer Makes Her Star.

SOME OF THE AMUSING INCIDENTS.

The Peculiar Baggage of Some.—Kissing and Handshaking.—Many People Bring Flowers.

A sailing day at the docks of any of our huge ocean going boats is an interesting and amusing occasion. The dock is nothing more than a long shed stretching out several hundred feet into the river, with two offices, one on either side, and littered over with casks, bales and cases of merchandise, either uncalled for from the last steamer in or waiting for the next outgoing vessel. And the baggage! It comes down on the transfer wagons, and on the hotel 'buses and carriage footboards—mountains of it. Some of it is labeled "cabin," but most of it "hold," and you see it run up the baggage gangway and swung out over the open hatchway. There is a rattle and crash at the donkey engine as these American "boxes" are consigned to the depth below.

Next in importance is the hand baggage, and this consists not only of bags, but overcoats, rugs and wraps of every conceivable description. The inexperienced traveler has been told that they weigh all the trunks in Europe and charge accordingly, so he loads himself down with bundles and boxes galore, forgetting that the first principle of a successful going abroad is to travel in "light marching order."

It is surprising, too, how much enthusiasm can be kindled in the breasts of your friends when you are going abroad. In fact, you never can tell the measure of your own popularity until an occasion of this kind, when they combine to give you a "sendoff," often going so far as to hire a tug and an "Eyetalian" band of music to accompany the party going abroad as far down the bay as the chartered steamer can keep pace with the Cunard, White Star, Guion or Inman liner, or, what is more to the point, when the "sendoff" party reach a few of the white caps and the inrolling swell from the lower bay.

Some friends have come all smiles and cheers, others lachrymose and full of sighs. And there by the rail is a party of five, silent and constrained amid so much light heartedness and hilarity. It is mother and father and two sisters; the brother is leaning against a pile of steamer chairs, and the wondering, eager look, that brilliant sunken eye, and hectic flush on the pale wan cheek, tell why he, when too late, is going abroad.

And how many times some people will kiss each other! And how many last messages, and frequently, too, commissions which mean an infraction of Uncle Sam's custom laws at the end of the return trip, are exchanged at the last moment!

In the midst of all this turmoil and crowding and pushing to and fro, the old timers, with their record of many voyages, look on in amused disgust, and wonder why some people can make such a fuss about such a little thing as going abroad.

A fortune, too, is spent on flowers. Huge baskets, set pieces, wreaths, bouquets and cut flowers ad infinitum cover the tables of "social hall," and make the already close atmosphere heavier and more unbearable yet by their sweet perfumes. To me this floral extravaganc[illegible] [redacted] tears and smiles and embracings, a rush down the gangway by the well dressed mob and then some climb on the near by cases or gather on the outer end of the dock to catch the last glimpse of the ship. Handkerchiefs are tied to canes and parasols; there is much cheering and last farewells. One young man calls out in a stentorian voice, "Give my love to Mary!" whereat there are cheers and laughter. And now at the far end of the dock there is a rattle and rumble and two cabs come tearing along. One contains a belated passenger, who has just time to scramble on board, the other the man who went after the key. And as the lady holds up the missing article, a conciliatory smile upon her face, that man sinks back upon a bale of goods, looking unutterable things.

The key to the situation is plain to everybody. Now the "planks" are down, and slowly and silently the huge black ship, that seems so high out of the water that she looks like a great warehouse afloat, backs out of her dock and is soon in midstream. Slowly yet she swings around and finally squares away, her nose pointing for the Narrows. A moment she seems to hang and to be taken aback by the tide, then forges ahead. The flag is dipped, then hauled down from the flagpole on the dock and those on board are at last going abroad.—Harper's Weekly.

One of the Firm.

"Who's the 'Co.' in your firm?" asked Smasher of his friend the grocer.

"My wife."

"Ah, she's a silent partner, is she?"

The grocer rubbed his chin for a moment.

"Well," he replied, in some doubt, "she ain't so all fired silent, when you come to think of it."—Detroit Free Press.

Horace Greeley and His Bride.

"When he was first married and brought his bride home on a visit," said an old acquaintance, "a sugar party was given in their honor on a neighboring farm. All the guests had arrived, and we were looking out, watching for the belated bride and groom. At last we saw something appearing in the distance. As this same object came nearer we discovered it was the old white horse of the Greeleys, slowly picking his way through the mud. On his back sat the bride in a brilliant yellow frock, with a green velvet belt, and behind her, wrapped in his famous white overcoat, sat the editor of the New York Tribune. It was the funniest sight I ever saw and set us off in fits of laughing. I remember," concluded my informant, laughing again at her recollection, "that I simply lay down and rolled upon the floor in a spasm of mirth."

Mr. Greeley came home every year and after a day or two on the farm would start out to walk miles and call on people. He was never known to knock at a farmhouse door. No matter whether he knew the inmates or not, he would push open the door, walk right in, sit down by the fireplace and fall to discussing crops and other topics dear to the farmer's heart. Everybody was glad to welcome this gentle, brusque intruder. —Press and Printer.

Dickens and His Wife.

My first view of Dickens was at an evening party when he was standing in the midst of a circle of ladies relieving himself in very energetic terms of his impressions de voyage. His hair was long and light and looked as if it had not recovered from the tangle incident to days of seasick misery. He had brought with him two velvet waistcoats of full dress, one a vivid green, the other a brilliant crimson. These were further ornamented by a profusion of gold watch chain. In 1841 a black satin waistcoat was almost the national costume of a gentleman in America, so that Mr. Dickens' vivid tints were very conspicuous.

Mrs. Dickens was a small woman of about 30. Her position as the lion's mate seemed embarrassing to her. She was not accustomed to dwell in "the fierce light" that shone upon every deed and word of the popular idol, and she evidently found satisfaction in quiet talks with me concerning the best shops in Oxford street and other such homely and familiar matters. There was no sign then of any disagreement or incompatibility between husband and wife. On the whole I should have said that in those days Mrs. Dickens showed signs of having been born and bred her husband's social superior.—Elizabeth Wormerly in Lippincott's Magazine.

How to Ascend Stairs.

The manner in which people go up stairs is productive of many ailments, and a careful observer who understands the anatomy of the body would not wonder that it is so. Notice how much of the "dead lift" there is about it. The feet and legs are made to act as levers, not only to force the weight of the body up, but also the additional weight which is the result of inertia. Instead of raising the chest and animating the body to lift its own weight, we bend the body nearly double, cramping the organs, hindering free circulation and consequently easy breathing. Panting for breath we reach the top, but in the effort what a spectacle we present! Going up stairs is easy and healthful when properly done. We will not say that it will not quicken the pulse, for in this as in any other exercise the rapidity and force of muscular action determine the rate with which the blood is forced to and from the heart.—Good Housekeeping.

The Toad In Mediæval Medicines.

Strange as it may seem to some, the ingredients of the witches' caldron in "Macbeth," at least a part of them, were once standard remedies among Europeans. In the tenth and eleventh centuries a sovereign cure for ague was the swallowing of a small toad that had been choked to death on St. John's eve, and a splendid remedy for rheumatism was to fasten the bands of clothing with pins that had been stuck into the flesh of either a toad or a frog. Physicians frequently recommended the water from a toad's brain for mental affections, and that a live toad be rubbed over the diseased parts as a cure for the quinsy.—St. Louis Republic.

Australian Nicknames.

The New South Wales men are called "Cornstalks," because they are tall and slim; the Victorians are known as "Gumsuckers," in allusion to the eucalyptus or gum tree; Queensland folk are "Bananalanders," for the banana grows plentifully there; and the South Australians are dubbed "Croweaters," because, so it is whispered, the early colonists shot down crows and fed on them when no other food could be got.—London Tit-Bits.

A BUFFALO HUNT.

When the Shaggy Creatures Were Very Plentiful Out in the West.

THE STORY OF A NOTED CRACK SHOT

Recollection of Old Days When Valuable Animals Were Killed for No Good Purpose.

While buffaloes were still plentiful I had a contract with a Chicago man to kill 5,000 buffaloes one winter. In those days there was no hunting for hides alone; the meat was highly prized and found a ready market in the east, and as the killing was done in the winter it usually reached there in very good condition.

The manner in which we used to go about it was, first sight our buffalo and then start for them; if they were too far away from the camp we usually endeavored to ride around them and lead them back, so as to leave their carcasses as near the station as possible. We would ride up to a bunch of buffalo and cut loose at them, following them and shooting them down as long as our horses would stand the work. Many a time a small party of us would entirely wipe out a good sized herd of buffalo in one day.

The horses I rode were trained buffalo hunters and required very little guiding. They knew the wallow or prairie dog town as well or better than I did, and their instinct made them avoid a charging buffalo better than if they had been held in check by the rein and I had attempted to guide them away from the infuriated animals that would sometimes turn and show fight. We usually shot the buffaloes between the ribs, through the lungs; one shot in this manner would run a few yards until the throat and lungs would fill with blood, when they would choke up and tumble over and lie there until the men with the teams came up to skin them and cut up the meat for shipment east.

I shot a remarkably big cow that way one morning, and after being satisfied that she was hit turned my attention to an old bull running just ahead on the other side of the horse. As I was watching my opportunity to make a short shot I suddenly heard a snort and then felt as though a bucket of water had been dashed in my face from a distance great enough to make it reach me as a spray rather than as a solid stream.

Almost at the same instant the old horse I was riding rose and made a leap over something, and as I turned and cleared my eyes I discovered that the old cow had whirled and attempted to charge, and in giving her final blow had completely covered myself and horse with blood from her throat and nostrils, going down almost in front of the horse at the same time. If the old fellow had not been sure footed and on the watch nothing could have prevented a bad spill.

The hide hunters pursued very nearly the same tactics as we observed, having wagons and skinners to follow after them, the principal difference being that they would generally kill more buffalo than the meat hunters, as the men with the wagons didn't have near as much work. We seldom had any trouble with the Indians, as we didn't hunt them, and even when on the warpath they were not looking for buffalo hunters. Emigrant trains and settlers were more in their way, as they afforded more plunder and didn't give them such a tough fight.

The only direct attack that was ever made on me by an Indian was on the Medicine. I was cantering around one afternoon toward a canyon where I had seen a bunch of buffaloes disappear, when I heard and almost felt something strike my horse just ahead of my legs. The poor animal gave a jump or two and went down head foremost on the frozen ground, never to rise again. I looked him over and found that he had been struck by a rifle ball.

Of course I immediately began looking in all directions for an enemy, but saw none, consequently the conclusion is that the shot had been fired by an Indian from a great distance, probably not less than a mile away, where there were some foothills and rocks, in which he had evidently been hiding. I was in no condition to look for him, as I was obliged to carry my saddle and traps back to camp to get another horse, and even if there had been another animal handy I probably should not have gone into the foothills, as I might have found more Indians than I wanted.

If the meat and hide hunters in the early days could only have known as much as we know now they might have all been millionaires by saving the heads and having them mounted, as I am told that a good buffalo head now is a very hard thing to get, and those that are in the market are held at from $500 to $1,000 each.

I did a good deal of trapping along the springs, principally at the beaver dams, and I am told by some of the boys who have been up along the Republican that there are still plenty of beavers in that section. One sure way to get one was to make a hole in the dam and set a trap very near it underneath the water. As soon as the leak was discovered some old beaver would go there to repair the dam and be pretty sure to get caught. Another favorite place to set traps was along the top of the dam, as many different animals would try to cross the river at night and get caught.

One afternoon we had set our traps along the top of the big dam on the Stinking Water, when the prairie on the other side of the river got afire and burned clear up to the water's edge. This fire drove the wolves, wildcats, coyotes and in fact everything along the river either into the stream or out on the dam, and the howls and yells that we heard during the night made us think that we had captured an entire menagerie. We didn't dare go near the place until daylight, as we didn't know what we had, but sunrise showed us a couple of wildcats, some wolves and an otter. One mode of getting skins was by poisoning wolves.

We would shoot and skin a buffalo and poison the carcass and leave it over night and go there the next morning, when we would usually find a number of dead wolves close to the dead carcass and a lot of trails leading from it in all directions. As a general thing, it was only necessary to follow one of these trails a very short distance when we would come across a dead wolf.—Dr. Carver's Interview in Denver News.

She Remembered the Cat.

A webfoot woman who started to jump into the Columbia river to drown herself suddenly remembered that she had left the cat in the pantry and hurried back home. She afterward said, "The idea of my struggling in the water and thinking that the cat was licking the cream off my milk in the pantry at that minute was more than I could bear."—Walla Walla Statesman.

THE RIVER STOPPED SHORT.

A Phenomenon That Rattled the Guide and Puzzled Senator Vest.

When old man Haskall was about the only person around Arlington, Mo., that claimed to be a guide, beside the Laurlie brothers, he accompanied Senator Vest on a trip to that mysterious river that rises up in Texas county and is known as the Roubideaux. Senator Vest had a desire to fish in these waters once and engaged Haskall to pilot him. They fished in the river about 20 miles above Waynesville, the county seat of Pulaski county, and after three days of varied success the senator concluded to make a run through to the Gasconade.

"Do you think we can make it, Haskall?" asked the senator of his guide.

"Reckon we kin, sure enough, by sundown."

Two hours of steady pulling, and the boat ran upon a gravel bar after being whirled about in a powerful eddy that nearly engulfed the little flat bottomed craft. Both the guide and the senator were puzzled, as they could see no water in front of them. The river stopped right there.

"Well, Haskall, what have you got to say about this? You're the guide. Said you knew all about this country and especially this river. Now, where has it gone to?"

Haskall was a bewildered man. He got up, shaded his eyes and looked up the stream from whence they had come. The water was rippling down toward the boat, but it never passed it. A farmer, driving his team, was coming up the road, and Haskall hailed him.

"Oh, mister! did yer see a river running anywhar down that way? I'll be danged if we hain't lost one!"

The farmer grinned as he looked at the puzzled guide and the perplexed senator.

"You know I did. 'Bout five miles down the road. Reckon you uns want a lift. I'll take ye an yer traps fur $3. Better lookout. You uns may git sucked under whar ye air now."

"Sucked under? What in thunder do you mean? Why the deuce don't you talk to him, Haskall?" exclaimed Senator Vest. "He must have been drinking."

"Nary a drink, mister. That river don't go no further on top till ye git below here five miles."

"You don't mean that it passes through a subterranean channel, do you, my friend?" asked Senator Vest.

"Reckon that's what you call it. It jist slips inter the gravel there an don't show up till ye git ter Waynesville. Want me to take you uns down thar?"

The boat was loaded into the wagon, and the senator and his guide taken to Waynesville, where the Roubideaux bubbles up again in a magnificent spring, taking up its course on the surface once more like a well behaved, navigable river.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Ireland's Sacred Oak.

In years gone by Ireland had a sacred oak dedicated to St. Columban, one of the peculiarities of the tree being that whoever carried a small bit of the wood or bark in his mouth would never meet with a violent death, it being especially efficacious in saving Christian martyrs from the block. It was known throughout the British isles as the Holy Oak of Kenmare. After the lapse of many centuries this sacred oak was uprooted by a storm, after which it was said to be guarded by angels to keep heretics from gathering the wood for fuel. At last a wicked tanner "barked" one of its largest limbs and tanned some leather, which he made into shoes for himself, imagining that such relics would bring him wealth and power. He wore them but once, however, but that one time was enough to make him an incurable leper.—St. Louis Republic.

Catching Crows In India.

In order to catch crows after the gypsy fashion in India, it is necessary to have a captive crow always on hand. This crow must be laid upon its back and its wings pegged to the earth with forked sticks. Immediately a free crow will attack it, and the captive crow, seizing the free one with its claws, will hold it tight. Crow No. 2 must then be taken and pegged down also. Other crows will come, and two more will soon be caught. They must also be laid out with the pegs, and then the four captives will take four other crows. This plan is followed until the hunter has taken all the crows he desires.—Asiatic Magazine.

Look Pleasant.

Have you ever considered the duty of being pleasant? Whether you feel happy or worried, whether things are going well or ill with you, you have no right, by your words or even by a doleful countenance, to cast gloom on others. Have you ever tried through the duties and trials of one day "to be a blessing," making your very presence a light and joy to all you meet? Try it.—Cumberland Presbyterian.

TRAINING A CHILD

A Very Important Duty That Usually Rests With the Mothers.

WHY A GREAT MANY OF THEM FAIL.

Reflections on the Incidents of One Day's Call.—Young People in Different Households.

It is of course true that no general and uniform system of training the young can be expected. Diverse natures will show their diversity in their relations to other people. It has been my fortune to make calls today on different families, and at each one to find children. At house No. 1 I met at the gate a big headed, big eyed boy that by temperament you could see was an inventor. Everything in this world existed for him to use for a purpose, and that purpose you would be likely to find original with himself. He had his foot on the rose trellis—now what do you suppose that trellis was to him? Clearly enough to us it was for a rosebush to climb on; but to him it was just as evidently for him to climb on.

Up he went, got caught by the rose and in the struggle the boy got the worst of it. It is not hard to see why rosebushes have thorns in that yard. As I entered the house big eyes was just in front of me, walking backward and talking in a half shy way in order to find me out. He evidently understood me, or thought he did. A moment after he had run up stairs, mounted the balustrade and came riding down with a whack at his mother's feet.

"I'll tell your father, sir, if you do that again!" she cried at him. Two bad things. She had in one sentence owned up that she could not manage him herself, and that a first wrong was to be repeated before it became correctable. We had some domestic matters to talk over, and the subject of canning fruit to discuss, which took us to the kitchen. Little Phil was everywhere, full of inquiry and never still. But at every move his mother was sharply saying: "Stop that, sir! If you don't I'll tell your father, and he'll train you."

I should have liked to see the boy's thoughts. Did he learn to fear his father and dread his coming, or were all the threats of his mother mere fustian? I wonder if she really ever reported the chap's performances? I believe not. It was a case of weakness. She was not self educated to educate any one else. All through my visit there was not one permit, not one sympathetic word of guidance, but constant effort to stop him. The poor fellow had, instead of a mother, a brakesman or brakeswoman, whose whole business in the way of training a child was to check him.

At home No. 2 I found a case of this sort, a peevish girl, so puny I could not be sure of her age, but about six. The little creature had not one easy nerve in her body—a restless, fretted body that always wanted something and did not know why. The seat of her trouble was her stomach, and the secret of that difficulty was inherited from both parents. The father is an inveterate smoker and the mother a devotee of tea and nervousness. The child of course is a tease and not easy to endure. The mother had had enough work to endure herself, but when it came to two more selves of the same sort she gave up all effort at using common sense. The little girl had only to tease for anything in order to get it, if possible. She ate at all times whatever she craved, notwithstanding the mother knew in general terms that she was aggravating the difficulty.

When I had been seated on the veranda overlooking a pretty garden the child began to pull off choice flowers and throw them in my lap. There really was no use in this, for I could not carry them away and did not wish to do so. Placing my hand on the little one I said: "Now, my little friend, we have enough. Let us talk about this beautiful blue one." We had a few moments' quite pleasant chat about the flower, but before I could quite realize that she had left me she was teasing her mother for a banana. The mother replied: "It isn't good for you, my dear. I would not eat it." But the child set up a determined whine and got what she wanted. I am ashamed to tell you how disagreeable this girl became to me in the course of a single half hour.

At house No. 3 I found a boy of about eight, his breeches rolled up as high as possible and his feet bare. He was a sturdy fellow, full of vitality and not very fond of book study. He knew me well and trotted me off at once down the garden way to show me something he had found out about insects, and more about flowers. We had a splendid time for half an hour before his mother discovered us, and then like a sensible woman she joined us in our study of things. "The boy doesn't like books very well," she said, "but he likes things, and that, I think, will have to do." But the time came for several duties and the boy was firmly ordered to go. He went without a complaint and with promptitude. It certainly was not agreeable to him to leave us, yet he was well trained.

Invited to dine at this house I did so, because it is pleasant always to be there as long as is considerate. At the table berries were passed to the smallest child, a girl of seven years, who declined them. Soon after she said she wished for berries. "What you have on your plate is very nice," said her mother, but gave her no berries. I said, "Will berries hurt her, do you think?" "Oh, no," she answered, "but I prefer she should learn not to change her mind so easily." This fine blending of freedom and firmness was producing an admirable family and a home of beauty.

The power to make beautiful souls is a rare gift—it constitutes the genius of motherhood. Nothing but that privilege and duty would have constituted woman what she is at her best—a creator. It is our true ambition. I do not lack sympathy for those who have inherited such biases or weaknesses as disqualify them for being noble mothers; only such persons should not become wives. They have no right to assume an office they cannot fill.—Mary E. Spencer in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Portland Chinaman declares that one of his countrymen has been tried for an offense by a Chinese tribunal and bricked up alive in a wall, and that such punishment is common with the Chinese. That is likely enough. It is quite in accordance with what we know of Chinese methods.

The people of India are said to be in a mood to rebel against British reforms affecting their social customs and habits. Very likely Russian intrigue has something to do with the matter. England's extremity in India would be Russia's opportunity. It is but a short march from Russia's outposts in Turkestan to Herat. The concentration of troops and supplies on the northern border of Afghanistan has been going on ever since the completion of the Trans Caspian Railroad.

Senator White, in an interview with the Washington correspondent of the Examiner, indicates his belief in the early passage of the tariff bill. This will be most welcome news to the whole people of the United States. The master hand of Senator Gorman is credited with having composed the existing differences and with having brought order out of chaos. The Maryland Senator is a diplomat of unrivalled skill, which fact was demonstrated on a former occasion by his skilful grouping of the elements that were united in the defeat of the force bill.

The northwest Provinces of Canada have an exhibit of the grain and stock resources of their country and are offering free homes there to American farmers. Some are taking advantage of the offer, although nothing to compare with the exodus from eastern Canada to the United States. Some day these Canadian Provinces will be good customers for our fruit growers. They can support a large population there, but they cannot raise fruit in any variety. They are much nearer California than any other sub tropical country.

The demand for an increased circulating medium in the United States comes from all quarters. The Republican Convention in Pennsylvania, the other day, pronounced for a per capita of $50. The Populists of Indiana, who are claiming to have greatly increased their voting strength, call upon the Government to expand the currency so that we shall have $40 per capita. It is undoubtedly the demand of the great mass of the Democrats, and the leaders of the party would do well to heed it. Our present circulation is grossly inadequate to the needs of the people.

To a dispassionate observer there would seem to have been a great deal of wantonness in the killing of strikers at Uniontown last week by hired detectives. The facts, as they have reached us, appear not to have warranted the turning loose of Winchesters in such an indiscriminate manner. It is high time that human life should be held in some estimation by persons whose authority to kill at all is of a doubtful character. Strikes are always to be deprecated and are frequently wrong, but ruthless ferocity only complicates the controversies and renders the adjustment of differences more difficult. According to telegrams the cowardly slaughter at Stickle Hollow was kept up after the strikers were in full retreat.

If Breckinridge—he of the many initials, who is running for Congress in the Ashland district of Kentucky—were wise in his day and generation, he would surrender the nomination to his opponent, Owens, and go in out of the wet. The ladies, God bless them, are after him in full view halloo, and he would do well to seek cover at once. The fact is that nothing would become Colonel Breckinridge just now so much as the joining of some expedition to the north pole. On reflection, the south pole is very much neglected just now, and the Colonel might win great fame by heading a forlorn hope to discover the true inwardness of Addialand in that little known region. His chances of ever sitting in the House of Representatives again are at zero and below, and everybody seems to know this but the silver tongued orator himself. When he does sit down it will hurt. All this reprobation arises from no sympathy with Miss Pollard but is owing to the awful stories the Colonel told on himself. If he had only known it there was one crisis in his life when silence would have been golden.—L. A. Herald.

NEW USE FOR CHLOROFORM.

A Railroad Conchful of Passengers Stupefied to Facilitate Robbery.

When the first section of the east bound passenger train No. 8 on the Chicago and Erie pulled into the station here the other day, the brakeman told Policeman Haller, who was at the depot, that all of the passengers in one of the day coaches had been chloroformed by some unknown person. The passengers consisted mostly of eastern people who were on their way home from the World's fair, and the train only stopped at a few places along the line.

After leaving Huntington the passengers in the day coach all settled down in their seats to take a nap, and after the train left Decatur the brakeman was passing through one of the day coaches, when he detected a peculiar odor and noticed that the passengers were nearly all sleeping heavily. Their sleep appeared so unnatural that the brakeman grew suspicious, and going into one of the sleepers, where there happened to be a doctor with whom he was acquainted, he asked the physician to go into the coach and see if he could detect anything wrong. The doctor complied with his request, and going into the coach immediately detected the odor of chloroform. The doors and windows were opened, and in a few minutes they succeeded in arousing the sleeping passengers, who fortunately had not breathed enough of the drug to affect them very much. They were surprised to learn that they had been drugged and were very thankful for the brakeman's timely discovery.

It is supposed that after leaving Huntington some one entered the car, and finding the passengers already half asleep had saturated the car with enough of the drug to make them sleep soundly. He then went into another car to wait for the chloroform to take effect. Undoubtedly he would have returned to rob the sleeping passengers had not his scheme been discovered. The car being closed tightly and unusually warm, in all probability the passengers in a short time would have been at the mercy of the chloroformer.—Lima Dispatch in Cincinnati Enquirer.

UNRAVELING THE MYSTERY.

Some New Light Has Been Thrown on the Blue Light Seen by Mrs. Carter.

An Oakland, (Ills.), correspondent of the Chicago Herald tells the following story:

When Zach Carter's house south of Martinville burned last August a year ago, and it was alleged he was cremated, the fact developed that he carried $46,000 insurance on his life, although he was always regarded as a poor man. How he could pay the premium on such an enormous sum is explained by his widow. About four years ago she was visiting a friend at Hartsburg in what was known as a haunted house.

One evening while out in the yard her attention was attracted to a spot on the lot by a blue light. She had a stick in her hand, and going to the spot indicated by the light placed the end of the stick in the ground, when it began to push and sway and move the dirt. A box was thus disclosed. She took it to her room and found it contained $11,000. She mentioned the fact to no one, not even her husband, for two years. After returning home she buried a part of the treasure and kept the rest in the house. That part, some $3,000, was burned.

Upon looking up the records it was found that some months previous to the alleged discovery of Mrs. Carter a safe in a lumber yard at Lawrenceville had been robbed of $11,000, and the man Penn, who was arrested for the crime, said that the amount taken had been buried, but refused to tell the place. Detectives were of the opinion that Carter was an accomplice of Penn, and a warrant has been sworn out for Mrs. Carter, charging her with receiving stolen property. She has since left the state.

New Lakes In the Territory.

A dispatch from Elreno, O. T., says that one of the curious features of the late unprecedented rise in the South Canadian river is the formation of numerous lakes along the bottoms of that stream. The sand has blown out of the bed of the river in times past until a high embankment is formed along the shores of the river, and behind this bank are left the lakes upon the subsidence of the stream. They give every indication of permanency, and some of them are many square miles in extent. The loss of valuable farm lands is very great, in many cases the settlers being driven from their homes and improvements.

Mourning Suspended.

The recent birthday of the queen of Denmark was the occasion of what appears to American eyes a singular proceeding. The Danish court is in mourning for Prince William of Glucksburg. On the royal birthday the lord chamberlain announced that mourning was "suspended" for 24 hours. For one day accordingly all was joy and gayety at Fredensborg. The next morning befitting gloom once more descended upon the castle, and the royal inmates again began to mourn as hard as they could for poor old Bill, whose spirit must have been touched by this delicate attention.—Foreign Letter.

The Watchman Stood the Test.

After several houses at Islip had been robbed by burglars Mr. W. B. Cutting employed a watchman to guard his place at night. It occurred to Mr. Cutting last week to go out on the piazza late at night to see if the watchman was alert. He did so and had only taken a few steps when a pistol shot rang out and a bullet whizzed past his head. Then he retreated, fully satisfied with his watchman.—Brooklyn Eagle.

RAILROAD COLLISIONS.

Horrible Results of Some of the Latest Suggest That Something Must Be Done.

A majority of the so called accidents on our railroads in the last three or four months have not been caused by the failure of rolling stock, bridges or roadbed to stand the strain put upon them, but to the terrible carelessness of employees in places of great responsibility. The collision in Michigan was caused by the reckless disobedience of plain orders on the part of the officers in charge of one of the trains. Apparently these officers readily took the risk of continuing beyond the point where they had been directed to stop, knowing that at any time they might meet another fast train on the same track. It will be noted that they were able to escape by jumping off just before the collision that killed 26 passengers.

The collision in Illinois a few hours earlier between a limited express and a train of coal cars could not have taken place if those in charge of the freight train had exercised ordinary care and observed the fundamental rules of the service. These are the latest additions to an appalling list of blunders and instances of reckless disobedience which have caused great loss of life since the beginning of last summer, and this latest collision, followed by a fire that left only the charred bodies of many victims who could not be identified, is the worst of all.

It is true that in the last few months many railroad lines have been overtaxed by a sudden and exceptional growth of passenger traffic which has found them poorly equipped both as to the safeguards which are needed and the employees required for the work. It is probable also that on some roads employees who were trustworthy under old conditions have become untrustworthy and even reckless under the strain of overwork. But, while the people generally may be interested in discussion of the underlying causes of such a series of dreadful events, they are more deeply interested in suggestions as to the action which can be taken to prevent such carelessness and disregard for the safety of passengers, as have been shown this year.

Are the penalties which a company may suffer heavy enough? The loss of property in a collision is not an important loss for a great corporation. The conviction of a conductor, or an engineer, or a train dispatcher on a charge of manslaughter can exercise very little restraining influence upon the company that employed him. But if it were possible to collect through the courts large sums in damages for the lives that are lost the companies would be much more careful both in the supervision of their employees and in the establishment of block signals and other safeguards.

For the 23 lives sacrificed in Michigan the relatives of the victims can recover from the company almost $130,000, or $5,600 for each life. If this limit, which is imposed by the laws in most of the states, were removed, such terrible slaughter as this would be so expensive to a company that the establishment of approved safeguards would not be neglected, and every possible effort to insure the efficiency of train officers and the preservation of passengers' lives would be made. Under present conditions a railroad company commonly suffers a much smaller loss in money when a passenger is killed than when one is crippled.—New York Times.

WHY HE KILLED HIMSELF.

A Seaman With a Good Record Could Not Endure a Reprimand.

John Neil, a seaman in the United States navy, serving on board the receiving ship Independence, Mare Island navy yard, was reprimanded the other morning for having overstaid his leave of absence, and for punishment was ordered restricted to the ship for a period of 60 days. As soon as Neil received his decree of punishment he went below into the ship bagroom, where he was found later with a bullet wound in his right temple. He was a man of unusual distinction, having received medal honors from congress for bravery and meritorious conduct.

He enlisted in the navy in 1861, served with Farragut at Mobile Bay and lashed the admiral in the rigging of the Hartford, where he stood by his side throughout the fight. Since the war Neil has served continuously in the navy and was one of the survivors of the ill fated Trenton, which went down in Apia harbor. He received general mention for bravery in rescuing shipmates from the Vandalia, which was also wrecked in the same gale. He was a native of Ireland, aged 62, and a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Regular Army and Navy union. The remains were interred in the navy cemetery at Mare island under the auspices of the Army and Navy union.—New York Sun.

A Parisian Newspaper Novelty.

A farthing newspaper is the latest novelty in Paris. It is called La Vie, and is edited by Pol Martinet, an anarchist, who has spent no inconsiderable part of his life in prison for his violent writings. As a farthing, or, to speak more precisely, a 2½ centime piece, is unknown to the French currency, the new venture is faced at the outset by a serious practical difficulty, but the projector gets over it in a rather ingenious fashion. The paper is to be printed in two different colors, each color being used on alternate days. Purchasers of a paper of one color will be charged a halfpenny, but they will get in exchange for it on the following day, without further charge, the paper of the other color.—London Daily News.

Money In Honey.

Some of the beekeepers in Skagit county, Wash., will take 100 pounds from each of quite a number of their colonies this season. This means $20 per swarm, gross, which is regarded as better than 100 per cent interest on the investment.—Tacoma News.

THE NEW CHINESE LEGATION.

The Minister and His Suite Live Royally In Washington Regardless of Expense.

The new legation has taken three houses for which the Chinese government pays $20,000 a year. They now occupy the old Sumner house, which is an annex of the Arlington. The United States paid $200 a day for the board of the infanta while her suite occupied these quarters. Yung Yu is paying $500 a day and says he thinks it is very cheap. While the women are kept in seclusion, the men have the run of the house and make themselves thoroughly at home. A part of the delegation were once in England and speak the English language fluently. They have the free and easy manner of the westerner and show a disposition to talk to any one who will listen. The minister himself is as dark as a sunburnt mulatto, being at least three shades blacker than the other members of the delegation.

Yung Yu says he is very well pleased with American cooking, but he has taken the precaution to provide himself with a Chinese cook and has installed him in the hotel kitchen. The legation eat but little meat, dining chiefly on vegetables. Yung Yu has never been out of China before. He was not a man of the highest rank in China, but like Ko-Ko, though in a different way, rose to distinction. He was an official in the province of Chin-Keang which corresponds there to the position of collector of the Boston port here. It was strictly on his merits that he was chosen by the prime minister to represent the emperor in this country pending the delicate relations between the two nations in consequence of the Geary act. As long as there are any strained relations existing no member of the legation will be allowed to accept the hospitality of an American, that being the law of the embassy.—Washington Cor. Boston Advertiser.

A CLEVER SWINDLER.

A Frenchman Wearing the Rosette of the Legion of Honor a Sharp Scoundrel.

A really clever thief is engaged just now in robbing people in Paris who possess securities payable to bearer. His plan is to do a little business with some of the Parisian banks in order that he may have an excuse for hanging about the counters. He then watches the bank's customers, especially ladies, and when he sees one of them receive from the clerks any bonds or other scrip to bearer he quietly makes a note of the person's name and the numbers on the documents. Having ascertained the address of his proposed victim, he calls there later in the day or early the next morning, and representing that he is a clerk from the bank, asks for the securities, alleging that there is some little informality in them that has to be rectified. As he is armed with the numbers, in nine cases out of ten the customer gives up the documents quite unsuspectingly.

So far this ingenious swindler has eluded all efforts to detect him. He is described as a gentlemanly looking man, who wears the rosette of an "officer" of the Legion of Honor, the little bit of ribbon of a plain "chevalier" apparently being thought not sufficiently imposing now that such decorations are so plentiful.—London Daily News.

His Last Fencing Lesson.

A dispatch from Lyons announces that a sad accident has occurred at the Military Medical school there. M. Jourdan, who was just about to take one of the highest medical degrees in the school, was having a fencing lesson from the maitre d'armes, when during a vigorous attack by the pupil a short piece broke off the end of the master's foil. M. Jourdan, who was making a lunge, literally spitted himself on the blade. He went up stairs to his room, fell on the bed and died in about an hour, in spite of all efforts to save him. No blame is attached to the fencing master, as the accident could not have happened but for the violence of his pupil's attack. M. Jourdan took the first prize for fencing last year and was training for a coming assault at arms.—Foreign Exchange.

The Katydid Was a Rattler.

There was a decided commotion at the home of J. D. Wells, in East Sedalia, recently. For several days Mrs. Wells had heard a peculiar buzzing in the closet where wearing apparel was kept, and was of the opinion that the noise was made by a captive katydid. Several times she was on the point of making an investigation, but household duties distracted her attention and she failed to make the search. Saturday her husband went into the closet to secure a heavy pair of trousers which he intended to don on account of the cool weather. Taking them from the hook, he gave them a vigorous shake, when out dropped a rattlesnake 3 feet in length, the reptile being what the occupants of the house had mistaken for a katydid.—Sedalia (Mo.) Dispatch.

A Widow.

Our house servant is a Japanese, polite as are most of his race. Among his duties is taking care of the chickens. One day he chanced to find a nest of fine eggs at the barn, away from the chicken yard, contributed by a hen that had escaped from the others, and as a consequence the eggs were not fertile. In ignorance of this fact, however, an old lady of our household—a widow—immediately put a hen to "set" on them. Biddy stuck to business, but to no purpose. When the required time had more than elapsed, the lady was very much put out and puzzled that no chickens had been hatched. Turning to the Jap, she said, "What do you suppose is the matter of those eggs, George?" George (bowing low): "Excuse me, ma'am, excuse me, but I think [bows again], I think that hen was a widow." Widow satisfied.—California Review.

Told at the Liars' Club.

"No sooner was I seated in the chair than the barber commented on the weather and directed a current of discourse into my ears.

"'Je ne comprend pas,' said I, with an inward chuckle, thinking his volubility would be checked.

"In very good French he started in afresh. I looked at him as if bewildered and then interrupted him by asking:

"'Was sagen Sie?'

"He began to repeat in German all that he had been saying, when I shut him off with:

"'Oh, talk to me with your fingers. I'm deaf and dumb!'"—Truth.

THE LAW'S DELAY.

A Persistent Boy's Fight For Personal Damages Against a Railroad.

The suit of Dennis Spillane against the Missouri Pacific Railway company is again on trial before Judge Slover. It is the third trial. Dennis is a 13-year-old boy, who, in the summer of 1888, while crossing the track at the foot of Grand avenue, was run over by a Missouri Pacific train. He was knocked to the side of the track, his scalp was fairly torn from his skull, and two fingers were cut off his left hand. The boy's head was sewed up by Dr. Iuen, and to the surprise of every one he recovered. Ever since the accident, however, he has been subject to epileptic fits, complains of pains in his head at all times and is unable to attend school or perform any work.

Dennis at once brought suit for $20,000 damages. The cause came up for trial in 1889, and the jury awarded him $8,000. The case was taken to the supreme court on an error made by Judge Slover in his instructions to the jury and remanded back for trial. At the second trial the jury failed to agree upon the amount of damages, and the case has since hung in the courts.—Kansas City Times.

The First of Its Kind.

The first wedding of colored people that ever occurred in the gubernatorial mansion of Virginia or in a similar mansion in the south took place in the dining room of the executive mansion at 1 o'clock on a recent afternoon. Winston Edwards, the governor's chief butler, who has served faithfully in his position under both Governor Lee and the present executive, and Jenny Leigh, an attractive maid, who has been in the governor's service for several years, were united in marriage by the Rev. Dr. Hunter of the Third Street African Methodist Episcopal church. After the ceremony, which was witnessed by several of the governor's household, the happy couple left on a bridal tour, which embraced a visit to the World's fair.—Richmond Dispatch in Baltimore American.

A Sign of the Period.

"Circumstances have changed indeed," said a down town merchant yesterday. "I had a load of coal thrown in front of my store this morning. Usually I have had to hunt up a man to carry the coal to the back part of my cellar, but today that pile of coal was a sign—like a want advertisement—which brought no less than 12 men who wanted to carry it back for me. When I told them I had hired some one to do the work, then they wanted to know if they couldn't do something else—anything."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Some New York Breakfasts.

Nearly every German bakery on Third avenue serves breakfast and luncheon to the furnished room population of the east side. Some serve eggs and cold meats, coffee, tea and chocolate. The majority, however, provide only coffee, tea, rolls and cakes. Nine out of ten of the customers take coffee and cake. The latter is not the French or American kind. It consists of four varieties dear to the German palate—apple, peach, prune and sugar. The last named is also called cinnamon. It is made of bread dough on the upper surface of which is spread some butter, sugar and cinnamon. Then it is baked hard.

The peach and apple cakes are made of thinly rolled bread dough, surmounted by slices of apples or peaches, as the case may be. When a little butter and sugar have been placed between the slices, the baker has approached as near perfection as possible. The dough of the prune cake is made like the other and covered thickly with mashed stewed prunes.

In the best bakeries a slice of any of these cakes from four to five inches square is sold for 5 cents. A good cup of coffee or tea with milk and sugar costs the same. Those who like light and sweet breakfasts can thus be satisfied for 10 cents. Probably 5,000 east siders eat such breakfasts in the bakeries every morning.—New York Sun.

Estate of Catherine Wallace, deceased—Filed decree of settlement of account and final distribution.

Estate of John Wallace, deceased—Filed decree of settlement of account and final distribution.

BORN.

NELLIGAN—Near Bishop, May 21, 1894, to Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Nelligan, a daughter.

Election of school trustee to-day.

Charley Summers of Bishop was in town yesterday.

George Hall of Alvord was in town during the week.

Gus. Walker of Olancha was in town at the end of last week.

County Clerk Hession is visiting the upper end of the Valley.

Hon. C. Mulholland arrived home yesterday from a visit to Los Angeles.

H. E. Wilkinson, formerly of Keeler, is in charge of the Weather Bureau at San Francisco.

Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz expects to start for San Francisco on to-morrow's train for a short visit.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fitzgerald came up from Lone Pine last Monday and spent the week in town.

Mrs. Jas. Holland of Lone Pine returned home on Wednesday from a long visit with relatives at Chicago.

The complete programme for the Fourth of July celebration at Independence will be published next week.

J. E. Jones Jr. came down from Round Valley Wednesday on land business. He returned home yesterday.

A fire at Collin's camp last Friday destroyed five sets of harness, a row of mangers and part of his corral fence.

Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Gorman started for San Francisco yesterday morning. They took with them their eldest son, Val.

Miss Birdie Levy started for San Francisco on Tuesday's train, where she will remain for several years attending school.

Several parties from Los Angeles and vicinity are looking over the country about Lone Pine. They intend going on up to Bishop.

A notice has been issued by the Southern Pacific Company to their agents to discontinue the sale of return Fair tickets after June 10th.

Louis V. Olcese arrived at Independence last Monday from Kern City. Mr. Olcese spent several days in town on business connected with the large mercantile firm of Ardizzi & Olcese.

G. S. Mains, the Miners' Watchmaker, is with us again and expects to visit Big Pine and Bishop in a couple of weeks. Anybody having watches or clocks to be repaired should give him a call without delay.

W. H. Crowley of Los Angles has rented the pasture land on W. J. Lake's ranch near Citrus and has about 150 head of horses ranging there. He has also rented over one hundred acres of alfalfa at Big Pine.

A meeting of the Republican County Central Committee was held at Independence last Friday evening. B. H. Yaney, W. H. Uhlmeyer, C. W. Craig and Thos. C. Boland were appointed delegates to the State Convention.

A. W. Eibeshutz received his commission as Receiver of the Land Office at Independence on Friday last and took possession of the office on Monday. The change in the Registership will not be made until the 30th of June.

On Saturday last M. Muldoon lost his well known stallion, Bismarck Jr. This horse during ten years of service in the Valley has done more for the horse industry than any other single individual ever brought here. He produced a large number of foals and his colts are all of fine, symmetrical proportions, and are good, useful all-purpose horses.

Stage Held Up.

Tuesday evening the Keeler stage was held up at a point about four miles north of Mojave in a deep ravine with steep banks. The team always climbs out of this hollow at a slow walk. Just on the top of the bank is a thick clump of greasewood. When the stage had got close up to this clump of brush a man started up from beside it, presented a shotgun at the driver and said in a peremptory way, "Hold up! hold up!" The muzzle of the gun could not have been more than six feet from the head of the driver. Diaz at once pulled up and the robber said, "Throw out the box." Diaz replied, "I have no box." The same demand was repeated and the same answer returned. The robber then said, "Have you not a box?" and Diaz replied "No, sir." The robber then said, "Drive on, then;" an order that Diaz promptly obeyed. Not another word was spoken beyond what is given above. The passengers were not molested in the least. The robber, so far as could be determined in the dim light, was well dressed; his clothing was dark in color and he wore a white shirt. Over his face he had a mask of dark cloth. His voice indicated a young man and the few words spoken were pronounced in a clear, decisive manner, as if the speaker was a person of good education. He must be a stranger at Mojave because any person well acquainted there knows that the Keeler stage never carries an express box, as this Claude Duval evidently thought it did.

Ascended Mt. Whitney.

H. W. Fairbanks, of the State Mining Bureau, arrived at Independence on Wednesday and spent a couple of days in this vicinity gathering information for the Bureau. In company with an assistant, R. P. Heagan, he has made an extensive trip through Southern Inyo, visiting the various mines in that section and preparing a report thereon. On the 26th of May Messrs. Fairbanks and Heagan left Lone Pine for the purpose of ascending Mt. Whitney. Their route lay directly up the canyon west of town. On the 27th they accomplished what has never been attempted before, the ascent of Mt. Whitney at this early part of the year. That this has been a season of most unusually light snow fall made the feat at all possible, and will probably not occur again in many years. As it was the men were caught in a snow storm and suffered much hardship. On the summit the cold was so intense that they only remained a few minutes. Mr. Fairbanks verifies the opinion of Mr. Hunter that a good trail could be made to the summit of Whitney from the East side by means of which the ascent could be made from Lone Pine in one day. We are not without hope that Congress will yet make an appropriation for this purpose.

Redrock Mining Notes.

When at Redrock station Tuesday night a passenger on the stage was told that Rudolph Schober had brought in $155 worth of gold which he and his partner, Brockman, had taken out in three days. John Gidon was also at the station; he said he was opening a claim adjoining that of Schober's and he finds good pay at every point prospected. A heavy shower had fallen the day before and hindered drywashing for some time. Over at Goler a pocket had been found a day or two before and over a thousand dollars worth of gold scooped up in a few minutes. There is no room for doubt that if water for hydraulic mining were once delivered at Redrock and Goler it would be a very productive gold field.

To State's Prison.

Henry Topp was arraigned in the Superior Court last Wednesday on a charge of selling whisky to an Indian. He plead guilty, waived time, and was sentenced by Judge Gill to sixty days at San Quentin. The leniency of his sentence is due to the fact that the man was a stranger in the country and entirely ignorant as to the crime. An Indian known as "Mose" appeared at the same time and plead guilty to the crime of burglary perpetrated upon the premises of Henry Levy. He was sentenced to three years imprisonment. Sheriff Gorman started below with his prisoners yesterday.

At The Marble Quarry.

On Thursday morning two car-loads of very choice marble were sent out from the Inyo quarry. The blocks weighed about ten tons each. There are orders now on file for marble that will keep the mill running day and night for six months to come. Mr. Holmes, the Superintendent has lately opened up an immense body of marble different from any yet found there. He says the ledge is over a mile long and a hundred feet wide. Mr. Holmes says he could take out blocks twice the length of the Washington monument and without a single flaw.

John McCormick came in from Mazourka yesterday and reports that two Mexicans have discovered placer gold in Mazourka Canyon. They had carried their dirt to the spring and he saw two pans washed, both of which contained good prospects. They told him that they had found some large nuggets. They got their dirt in a gulch about half a mile northward of the spring.

Under the proper heading will be found the announcement of J. J. Moore as a candidate for the office of Treasurer of Inyo county. Mr. Moore needs no introduction to the voters of Inyo. There is no better known man in the Valley than Jack Moore, and no man held in higher esteem by those who know him.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Shelhamer of Pasadena were visitors at Independence at the close of last week. Mr. Shelhamer is expecting an artesian well-boring plant to arrive in a few days and as soon as it is received will commence work on his tract of land south of Olancha.

John Nelson was arrested on Wednesday on a charge of selling whisky to an Indian by Sheriff Gorman. He had a preliminary examination yesterday before Justice Davidson and held over to appear before the Superior Court.

Quite a party of Independence people started for the Mid-winter Fair last Tuesday consisting of J. J. Gunn and wife, Mrs. John Shepherd, Miss Birdie Levy, L. Wood and Henry Fehrman.

Why Is It?

That Hercules gas and gasoline engines are held by the public in so much higher estimation than other engines? The parties using these engines, and their name is legion, are the ones who can best answer this question. They well know that the ease and promptness with which these engines are started and the very little care required to keep them running month after month with the most perfect satisfaction. They run without a spark battery, which is admitted to be unreliable. The simple ignition tubes of the Hercules engines are far better. Send for catalogue. If you want second hand engines of other makes at cheap rates we can supply you. We have a number taken in trade and cannot take any more until these are realized on. PALMER & REY TYPE FOUNDRY, 405–407 Sansome St., San Francisco.

"Tesla's Glow" in England.

Tesla's experiments with high frequency currents before the Royal institution have laid such hold on the imagination of the English, who, as Tesla says in a recent letter to a friend in New York, "are the most enthusiastic people in the world in scientific matters," that crowds flock daily to the Crystal Palace to see the high pressure demonstrations given at the electrical exhibition. Many people find it hard to believe, without actually seeing it, that a tube carried in the hand, without any wire connection whatever, will fill a room with beautiful light and high pressure discharges with their dazzling and exquisite effects of color and light, and the illumination of wireless vacuum tubes promises to be indispensable at any afternoon party.—Exchange.

A COLONIAL THANKSGIVING.

Conscience Was Tender, but Appetite Was Strong and Conquered.

Among the papers of the late ex-State Senator Guy C. Stoddard of the town of Ledyard was found an old newspaper clipping containing a quaint account of an old colonial Thanksgiving church service and dinner. It was written in the year 1714 by the Rev. Lawrence Conant of the old South Parish in Danvers, Mass., and runs thus:

"Ye Governor was in ye house and Her Majesty's commissioners of ye customs, and they sat together in a high seat of ye pulpit staire. Ye Governor appears very devout and attentive, although he favors Episcopacy and tolerates ye Quakers and Baptists.

"He was dressed in a black velvet coat, bordered with gold lace, and buff breeches with gold buckles at ye knees, and white silk stockings.

"There was a disturbance in ye galleries, where it was filled with divers negroes, mulattoes and Indians, and a negro called Pomp Shorter, belonging to Mr. Gardiner, was called forth and put in ye broad isle, where he was reproved with great carefulness and solemnity.

"He was then put in ye deacons' seat between two deacons, in view of ye whole congregation; but ye sexton was ordered by Mr. Prescott to take him out, because of his levity and strange contortion of countenance (giving grave scandal to ye grave deacons), and put him in ye lobby under ye staire; some children and a mulatto woman were reprimanded for laughing at Pomp Shorter.

"When ye services at ye meeting house were ended ye council and other dignitaries were entertained at ye house of Mr. Epes, on ye hill near by, and we had a bountiful Thanksgiving dinner with bear's meat and venison, the last of which was a fine buck, shot in ye woods near by. Ye bear was killed in Lynn woods near Reading.

"After ye blessing was craved by Mr. Garrich of Wrentham, word came that ye buck was shot on ye Lord's day by Pequot, an Indian, who came to Mr. Epes with a lye in his mouth like Ananias of old.

"Ye council therefore refused to eat ye venison, but it was afterward decided that Pequot should receive 40 stripes save one, for lying and profaning ye Lord's day, restore Mr. Epes ye cost of ye deer, and considering this a just and righteous sentence on ye sinful heathen, and that a blessing had been craved on ye meat, ye council all partook of it but Mr. Sheperd, whose conscience was tender on ye point of ye venison."—New Haven Cor. New York Tribune.

Bread For Trout.

Trout are generally accredited with being fish of a most fastidious diet, scorning any sort of food save such delicate morsels as may happen to tickle their palates for the time. In the common belief they are epicures of the very first water. It is no doubt that the richer and more plentiful the food supply the less ready are trout to feed on any lure artificially presented, and the closer we imitate their natural food at the time the greater is our success in attempting to make the trout take. At the same time there can be no question that the trout is as omnivorous as most fish, if not more so, and will eat almost anything. It cannot with truth be predicted of bread, for example, that it is either a natural or a common food for the trout, yet, by perseveringly throwing pellets into the stream, trout may soon be educated into taking them, and as a matter of fact the fish in any particular stream may soon be educated to such a pitch of rivalry that there will be a rush for a piece of bread cast upon the water.—London Field.

The Czar's Adventure With a Bear.

Although no particular friend of sport, Alexander decided to follow up the traces of two bears which had been discovered near the village of Tokrovo. He was accompanied by a numerous suite. It so happened that one of the bears sent him spinning on the ground, without, however, doing him an injury, and the animal fell dead, being killed by one of his followers about 100 yards off. Alexander is reported to have said, "The beast seemed quite au fait in the manners and customs of the court, for he did not stop when he came up to me, as he had not been introduced." The bystanders hardly dared to smile, for they were convinced of the existence of a nihilist plot among the bears.—Corriere di Napoli.

A Mean Man.

A very widely known clergyman in a town near to New York had the misfortune to lose his wife while the invalid was absent on a vain quest for health. His grief did not cloud his intellect. He went to the local railroad office and endeavored to persuade the agent to send his wife's body back to the city on her return excursion ticket.—Boston Saturday Gazette.

ONLY GIRL AT OVERLOOK

By FRANKLIN FYLES.

"You will be afraid if left alone," Gerald protested; "you can't go to sleep, nervous as you must be."

"I surely can't go to sleep talking," was her rejoinder, with the first touch of coquetry she had indulged in at Overlook.

"I won't talk, then; I'll only keep guard out here until daylight. Eph may return."

"But there's the watchman. It is his duty."

"It would be my delight."

That silenced the invisible inmate of the cabin. The moon shone into the square opening, but Mary was ensconsed somewhere in the darkness that bordered the income of light.

"Should I apologize?" Gerald at length began again. "It is like this, Miss Warriner—I used to know how to behave politely to a lady; but for six years I've lived in wildernesses—in railroad camps—from Canada to Mexico. We've had no ladies in these rough places, no women, except once in a while some mannish washerwoman or cook. That's what makes you so rare, so unexpected; that is why it would be a delight to be a patrolman outside your quarters; that is why I don't wish to go away."

"Oh, oh! I am interesting because I am the only specimen of my sex at Overlook. That isn't a doubtful compliment; it is no compliment at all. Good night."

"You misconstrue me altogether. I mean"——

"I am sure you do not mean," and now the tone was pleadingly serious, "to remain here at my window after I request you to go away. I am, as you have said, the only girl at Overlook."

"If there were a thousand girls at Overlook"——

"Not one of them, I trust, would prolong a dialogue with a young gentleman at night through the open window of her bedroom."

Half in respectful deference to Mary's unassailable statement of the rule of propriety applicable to the situation, and half in inconsiderate petulance at being dismissed, Gerald let go of the sash with an impulse that almost closed it. This time two miniature hands came out under the swinging frame. Would more than one hand have been naturally used? Was it not an awkward method of shutting a window? And Mary Warriner was not a clumsy creature. But there were the hands and Gerald grasped them. They fluttered for freedom like birds held captive in broad palms by completely caging fingers. Then he uncovered them, but for an instant kept them prisoners by encircling the wrists long enough to impetuously kiss them. Another second and they were gone the window was closed and the offender was alone.

He walked slowly away, accusing himself of folly and ungentlemanliness, and he felt better upon getting out of the clear, searching moonshine into the dim, obscuring shade of rocks and trees, among which the path wound crookedly. There rapid footsteps startled him, as though he were a skulking evildoer, and the swift approach of a man along an intersecting pathway made him feel like taking to cowardly flight. But he recognized the monomaniac Eph, who was in a breathless tremor.

"Mr. Heath, could a man walk to Dimmersville before the telegraph station there opens in the morning?" Eph asked, with several catches of breath, and a reeling movement of physical weakness.

"You go to bed, Eph," was the reply, meant to be soothing, "and I'll see that your telegram goes from here the earliest thing in the morning. That won't be more than six or seven hours from now."

"Six or seven hours," the poor fellow deploringly moaned; "I'll be a good many years older by that time. Oh, it's awful to have your life go whizzing away like mine does, and he clutched at Gerald with his fidgety hands, with a vague idea of slowing himself by holding to a normal human being.

Then he darted away, swaying from side to side with faintness, and disappeared in the foliage which lined the path he was following.

Gerald watched him out of sight, and was about to resume his own different way, when the voice of Tonio Ravelli was heard, with its Italian extra "a" to the short words and a heavy emphasis on the final syllable of the long ones.

"Mistair Heath," he said, "I saw-a your affectionate par-ting wees Mees Warriner."

Gerald had just then the mind of a culprit, and he began to explain apologetically: "It was cowardly in me to insult a defenseless girl. She didn't invite it. I'm ashamed of myself."

He hardly realized to whom he was speaking. The two men were walking rapidly, Ravelli taking two strides to one of the bigger Gerald, in order to keep alongside.

"You should be ashamed—you—a scoundrel."

As much of jealous fury and venomous malice as could be vocalized in six words was in Ravelli's sudden outbreak. Gerald was astounded. He turned upon his companion, caught him by both lapels of his coat and shook him so violently that his boot soles pounded the ground. Ravelli staggered back upon being loosed, and threw one arm around a tree to steady himself.

"I didn't mean to hurt you," said Gerald, "but you shouldn't be reckless with your language. Perhaps you don't know what scoundrel means in English."

"I saw you-a kiss her hand."

"Did you? Well, do you know what I'd do to you, Ravelli, if I saw you kiss her hands—as I did—without her consent? I'd wring your miserable neck. Now, what are you going to do to me?"

"I am-a going to keel you."

The blade of a knife flashed in Ravelli's right hand as he made a furious onslaught. But the stronger and quicker man gripped both of his assailant's wrists, threw him violently to the ground and tortured him with wrenches and doublings until he had to drop the weapon. In the encounter the clothes of both men were torn, and when Ravelli regained his feet blood was dripping from his hand. The blade had cut it.

"You meant to kill me," Gerald exclaimed.

"I said-a so," was the sullen, menacing response.

"And with my own knife," and Gerald, picking up the knife, recognized it.

"Your-a own knife—ze one zat you carve-a Mary's hand with so lovingly."

Ravelli had retained it since the previous afternoon, when he had picked it up from Mary Warriner's desk. Its blade was now red with blood, as Gerald shut and pocketed it.

"You cowardly murderer!"

"Murderer? Not-a yet. But I meant to be."

Ravelli turned off by the cross path and Gerald passed on.

CHAPTER III.

He roughly seized her hand.

The first man to go to work at Overlook in the morning was Jim Wilson, because he had to rouse the fire under a boiler early enough to provide steam for a score of rock drills. The night watchman awakened him at daybreak, according to custom, and then got into a bunk as the other got out of one.

"Everything all right?" Jim asked.

"I guess so," the other replied. "But I hain't seen your boiler sence afore midnight. Eph was disturbin' Mary Mite, and so I hung 'round her cabin pretty much the last half of the night."

Jim went to his post at the boiler, and at an unaccustomed pace, from the point where he first saw and heard steam hissing upward from the safety valve. On quitting the night previous he had banked the fire as usual and this morning he should have found it burning so slowly that an hour of raking, replenishing and open draughts would no more than start the machinery at 7 o'clock. Going nearer he found that open dampers and a fresh supply of coal had set the furnace raging.

What was that which protruded from the open door and so nearly filled the aperture that the draught was not impaired?

A glance gave the answer. It was the legs and half the body of a man, whose head and shoulders were thoroughly charred, as Jim was horrified to see when he pulled the remains out upon the ground.

Jim ran to tell the superintendent, and within a few minutes a knot of excited men surrounded the body. The gathering grew in numbers rapidly. By means of the clothing the dead and partially burned man was identified at once as Tonio Ravelli. That he had been murdered was an equally easy conclusion. The murderer had apparently sought to cremate the corpse. Whether he had found it physically impossible or had been frightened away could only be conjectured.

"Who can have done it?" was the question asked by Superintendent Brainerd, the autocrat of Overlook.

There was a minute of silence, with all staring intently at the body, as though half expecting it to somehow disclose the truth. The night watchman was first to speak.

"Eph might have done it," he said.

Then he told of the monomaniac's visit to the telegraphic station, and of the acute stage which his malady had reached. Nobody else present had seen him since the previous evening. Superintendent Brainerd ordered a search of the lodgings. Ten minutes were sufficient for a round of the different quarters. Eph was in none of them. The searchers returned to the furnace, and with them came Gerald Heath.

"I met Eph yonder where the paths cross, not a hundred yards from here, a little past midnight," Gerald said. "He was terribly excited. That was after he had tried in vain to telegraph a crazy message. Evidently his delusion, that his whole life was condensed into a brief space, had driven him to a frenzy. He spoke of walking to Dimmersville, but I tried to quiet him, and he disappeared."

Dimmersville was a town about ten miles distant, in a direction opposite to that from which the railroad had worked its way through the mountains. No wire connected it with Overlook, and there was no public road for the nearest third of the way, although a faint trail showed the course that a few persons had taken on foot or horseback.

"Very likely Eph has gone toward Dimmersville," Brainerd argued, "and we must try to catch him."

Before the order could be specifically given a horse and rider arose over the edge of the level ground and came into the midst of the assemblage. The man in the saddle had a professional aspect, imparted chiefly by his smoothly shaven face. In this era of mustaches a hairless visage is apt to be assigned to a clergyman, who shaves thus from a motive of propriety; an actor who does it from necessity, or somebody who aims at facial distinction without the features suitable to that purpose. A countenance of which it can only be said that it has one nose, one mouth and two eyes, all placed in inexpressive nonentity, and which is dominated utterly by hair on and around it, may be less lost to individuality if entirely shaven. Of such seemed the visage of the dark man who calmly rode into the excitement at Overlook.

"Which way have you come?" Brainerd asked.

"From Dimmersville," was the reply.

"Did you see anybody on the way?"

"I started very early. Folks were not out of their beds in the houses—as long as there were any houses—and that is only for five or six miles, you know. After that—yes, I did see one man. A curiously excited chap. He looked tired out. He asked the distance to Dimmersville and whether the telegraph office would be open by the time he got there. Then he skurried on before I'd half answered him."

All that was known of the murder was told to the stranger by half a dozen glib tongues, and it was explained to him that he had encountered the maniacal fugitive.

"I knew there was something wrong about him," said the stranger. "It is my business to be observant."

He dismounted and hitched his horse to a tree. The dead body was shown to him. He examined it very thoroughly. All the particulars were related to him over and over. Then he drew Superintendent Brainerd aside.

HINDOO COURTSHIP.

A Letter From a Young Man to His Prospective Father-in-law.

"We have received your card. The points have been carefully considered and brought to an amicable settlement. It is through my persuasion that the parents are ready to cast their only son in lot with your daughter. But, sir, I must ask you to be a little more liberal. I am a go between, and concessions and compromise must be made in order that the matter may be brought to a head. You are to bear the following expenses: First, 1,500 rupees cash; second, 1,000 rupees ornaments; third, the whole charge of my education up to the B. L. examination. Taking into consideration the time we live in and the society we deal with, you are not to lose by the bargain. Rather we shall be lowered and our prestige gone. However, we know not what mysterious attraction draws me to you. If you meet the above demand, I shall make everything square for you. My power is paramount, though I am obedient and submissive.

"I must call your attention to the importance of the third demand made above. The other demands you will meet at the time of the marriage, and there is no danger but the other demand, which is submitted through my express desire, is liable to run the risk of breach of faith. I will live with you under the same roof. I will be your son, and you my father, and my whole prospect depends upon your honesty. My father withholds from me every expense of my college career, and you are intrusted with his honorable position. None will respond to the proposed match but my humble self, and the whole odium or praise which is to ensue as the result of the match shall fall upon my head.

"Therefore I urge you to think over the matter, for we are proceeding to a very solemn problem of life. The problem must be solved, and it is to be done through your unlimited benevolence. Tell me, sir, most candidly, how does your daughter look? Is she really a beautiful girl of 11? For upon this fact depends the whole question. If your daughter be not a fair lady, it would be of no avail. Everything shall be undone, but I hope you are strong in that point, as you have often asserted it to be. Reply sharp, and write on a stamped envelope, otherwise the letter will fall into the hands of my father. Be up and doing, and write me quick. For upon the receipt of your letter we will start and see your daughter and bring the matter to a close."

Fishing Dogs.

At a certain point all the men and dogs came to a halt. Half the dogs and men then moved farther along the water's edge about 200 yards. At a concerted signal the dogs were started from their respective points, and swam straight out seaward in single file in two columns. At a wild, sharp cry from all the Ainus the right column wheeled left and the left column wheeled right until the head of each column met. Then at another signal all of them swam in line toward the shore, advancing more and more in crescent formation.

As they neared the shore, increasing numbers of fish appeared in the shallow water, frightened forward by the splashing of the advancing column of dogs, which, as soon as their feet touched bottom, pounced upon the fishes as quick as a flash. The dogs promptly brought the fish which they had seized to their masters, who cut off the heads and gave each dog the head, which belonged to him as his share of the catch. The dog which caught nothing got nothing. I believe this dog drill of the Ainus is entirely unique.—Life with Trans-Siberian Savages.

THE COMPLEXION OF A CHINESE

Is not yellower than that of an unfortunate individual whose liver complaint has assumed the chronic form. The eyeballs of the sufferer assume a saffron hue, there is dull pain in the region of the organ affected, the tongue is coated, breath sour, sick headaches usually but not always occur, and there is sometimes dizziness on arising from a sitting posture. Constipation and dyspepsia are also attendants of this very common ailment, always in its aggravated form, liable to breed abscesses of the liver, which are very dangerous. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters wholly eradicates it, as well as the troubles complicated with it and which it originates. In chills and fever, a complaint which always yields to the Bitters, the liver is seriously involved. This fine alterative tonic removes costiveness and indigestion, rheumatic, nervous and kidney trouble and debility.

GRANDMOTHER'S ROSARY.

A silver crucifix worn thin and bright,
The feet all smooth with kisses from dead lips
Forever praying, as the busy hands
Forever spun; I pass the shining strands,
Hallowed with age, between my finger tips,
While tears not all unbidden dim my sight;
Nor need I blush for them, dear soul so white!
Ripened in simpler days and holier lands,
She went to heaven eighty years ago.
Her children praised her, following the feet
That led them only virtue's way to know;
And this is left, a relic, quaint and sweet,
Blessed reminder of a saint to me,
Of all I long but dare not hope to be.
—Mary E. Mannix in Rosary.

THE BLACK DOG.

There was a ceaseless rumble in the air as the heavy rain drops battered upon the laurel thickets and the matted moss and haggard rocks beneath. Four water soaked men made their difficult ways through the drenched forest. The little man stopped and shook an angry finger at where night was stealthily following them. "Cursed be fate and her children and her children's children! We are everlastingly lost!" he cried. The panting procession halted under some dripping, drooping hemlocks and swore in wrathful astonishment.

"It will rain for forty days and forty nights," said the pudgy man moaningly, "and I feel like a wet loaf of bread now. We shall never find our way out of this wilderness until I am made into a porridge."

In desperation they started again to drag their listless bodies through the watery bushes. After a time, the clouds withdrew from above them and great winds came from concealment and went sweeping and swirling among the trees. Night also came very near and menaced the wanderers with darkness. The little man had determination in his legs. He scrambled among the thickets and made desperate attempts to find a path or road. As he climbed a hillock he espied a small clearing upon which sat desolation and a venerable house, wept over by wind waved pines.

"Ho," he cried, "here's a house."

His companions straggled painfully after him as he fought the thickets between him and the cabin. At their approach the wind frenziedly opposed them and skirled madly in the trees. The little man boldly confronted the weird glances from the crannies of the cabin and rapped on the door. A score of timbers answered with groans, and within something fell to the floor with a clang.

"Ho," said the little man. He stepped back a few paces.

Somebody in a distant part started and walked across the floor toward the door with an ominous step. A slate colored man appeared. He was dressed in a ragged shirt and trousers, the latter stuffed into his boots. Large tears were falling from his eyes.

"How d' do, my friend?" said the little man affably.

"My ol uncle, Jim Crocker, he's sick ter death," replied the slate colored person.

"Ho!" said the little man. "Is that so?"

The latter's clothing clung desperately to him and water sogged in his boots. He stood patiently on one foot for a time.

"Can you put us up here until tomorrow?" he asked finally.

"Yes," said the slate colored man.

The party passed into a little unwashed room, inhabited by a stove, a stairway, a few precarious chairs and a misshapen table.

"I'll fry yer some po'k from make yer some coffee," said the slate colored man to his guests.

"Go ahead, old boy," cried the little man cheerfully from where he sat on the table smoking his pipe and dangling his legs.

"My ol uncle, Jim Crocker, he's sick ter death," said the slate colored man.

"Think he'll die?" asked the pudgy man gently.

"No!"

"No?"

"He won't die! He's an ol man, but he won't die yit! The black dorg hain't been around yit!"

"The black dog?" said the little man feebly. He struggled with himself for a moment.

"What's the black dog?" he asked at last.

"He's a sperrit," said the slate colored man in a voice of somber hue.

"Oh, he is? Well?"

"He ha'nts these parts, he does, an when people are goin to die he comes and sets and howls."

"Ho!" said the little man. He looked out of the window and saw night making a million shadows.

The little man moved his legs nervously.

"I don't believe in these things," said he, addressing the slate colored man, who was scuffling with a side of pork.

"Wot things?" came incoherently from the combatant.

"Oh, these 'er' phantoms and ghosts and what not. All rot, I say."

"That's because you have merely a stomach and no soul," grunted the pudgy man.

"Ho, old pudgkins!" replied the little man. His back curved with passion. A tempest of wrath was in the pudgy man's eye. The final epithet used by the little man was a carefully studied insult, always brought forth at a crisis. They quarreled.

"All right, pudgkins; bring on your phantom," cried the little man in conclusion.

His stout companion's wrath was too huge for words. The little man smiled triumphantly. He had staked his opponent's reputation.

The visitors sat silent. The slate colored man moved about in a small personal atmosphere of gloom.

Suddenly a strange cry came to their ears from somewhere. It was a low, trembling call which made the little man quake privately in his shoes. The slate colored man bounded at the stairway and disappeared with a flash of legs through a hole in the ceiling. The party below heard two voices in conversation, one belonging to the slate colored man and the other in the quivering tones of age. Directly the slate colored man reappeared from above and said, "The ol man is took bad for his supper."

He hurriedly prepared a mixture with hot water, salt and beef. Beef tea it might be called. He disappeared again. Once more the party below heard, vaguely, talking over their heads. The voice of age arose to a shriek.

"Open the window, fool! Do you think I can live in the smell of your soup?"

Mutterings by the slate colored man and the creaking of a window were heard.

The slate colored man stumbled down the stairs, and said with intense gloom, "The black dorg'll be along soon."

The little man started and the pudgy man sneered at him. They ate a supper and then sat waiting. The pudgy man listened so palpably that the little man wished to kill him. The wood fire became excited and sputtered frantically. Without a thousand spirits of the winds had become entangled in the pine branches and were lowly pleading to be loosened. The slate colored man tiptoed across the room and lit a timid candle. The men sat waiting.

The phantom dog lay cuddled to a round bundle, asleep down the roadway against the windward side of an old shanty. The specter's master had moved to Pike county, but the dog lingered as a friend might linger at the tomb of a friend. His fur was like a suit of old clothes. His jowls hung and flopped, exposing his teeth. Yellow famine was in his eyes. The wind rocked shanty groaned and muttered, but the dog slept. Suddenly, however, he got up and shambled to the roadway. He cast a long glance from his hungry, despairing eyes in the direction of the venerable house. The breeze came full to his nostrils. He threw back his head and gave a long, low howl and started intently up the road. Maybe he smelled a dead man.

The group around the fire in the venerable house were listening and waiting. The atmosphere of the room was tense. The slate colored man's face was twitching and his drabbed hands were gripped together. The little man was continually looking behind his chair. Upon the countenance of the pudgy man appeared conceit for an approaching triumph over the little man, mingled with apprehension for his own safety. Five pipes glowed as rivals of the timid candle. Profound silence drooped heavily over them. Finally the slate colored man spoke:

"My ol uncle, Jim Crocker, he's sick ter death."

The four men started and then shrank back in their chairs.

"Damn it!" replied the little man vaguely.

Again there was a long silence. Suddenly it was broken by a wild cry from the room above. It was a shriek that struck upon them with appalling swiftness, like a flash of lightning. The walls whirled and the floor rumbled. It brought the men together with a rush. They huddled in a heap and stared at the white terror in each other's faces. The slate colored man grasped the candle and flared it above his head. "The black dorg," he howled, and plunged at the stairway. The maddened four men followed frantically, for it is better to be in the presence of the awful than only within hearing.

Their ears still quivering with the shriek, they bounded through the hole in the ceiling and into the sickroom.

With quilts drawn closely to his shrunken breast for a shield, his bony hand gripping the cover, an old man lay, with glazing eyes fixed on the open window. His throat gurgled and a froth appeared at his mouth.

From the outer darkness came a strange, unnatural wail, burdened with weight of death, and each note filled with foreboding. It was the song of the spectral dog.

"God!" screamed the little man. He ran to the open window. He could see nothing at first save the pine trees, engaged in a furious combat tossing back and forth and struggling. The moon was peeping cautiously over the rims of some black clouds. But the chant of the phantom guided the little man's eyes, and he at length perceived its shadowy form on the ground under the window. He fell away gasping at the sight. The pudgy man crouched in a corner, chattering insanely. The slate colored man, in his fear, crooked his legs and looked like a hideous Chinese idol. The man upon the bed was turned to stone, save the froth, which pulsated.

In the final struggle terror will fight the inevitable. The little man roared maniacal curses, and rushing again to the window began to throw various articles at the specter.

A mug, a plate, a knife, a fork, all crashed or clanged on the ground, but the song of the specter continued. The bowl of beef tea followed. As it struck the ground the phantom ceased its cry.

The men in the chamber sank limply against the walls, with the unearthly wail still ringing in their ears and the fear unfaded from their eyes. They waited again.

The little man felt his nerves vibrate. Destruction was better than another wait. He grasped a candle and, going to the window, held it over his head and looked out.

"Ho!" he said.

His companions crawled to the window and peered out with him.

"He's eatin the beef tea," said the slate colored man faintly.

"The damn dog was hungry," said the pudgy man.

"There's your phantom," said the little man to the pudgy man.

On the bed, the old man lay dead. Without, the specter was wagging its tail.—New York Tribune.

ANIMAL VOICES.

The Slow Development and Future Extinction of the Human Speech.

ONCE NO LIVING THING HAD A VOICE.

The Time May Come When it Will Occur Again, at Least as Far as Human Beings are Concerned.

There was a time in the history of the world when even the animals had no voice. There were no sounds or noises then but those made by the winds whistling about mountain tops and howling through primeval forests, or of the waves dashing on shores absolutely silent and dead. The animals of those geological epochs, being in the plastic state preceding the development of the osseous structure that now gives form and comeliness to the human body, were just beginning to breathe the external air with a gentle respiration. Ages, it should rather be said epochs, were passed in this manner, in the course of which the habit of respiration developed the lungs. Then the use of the throat essential to the taking of food produced those organs necessary to speech, which are called the pharynx, glottis and larynx. It seems that Providence, as a matter of supreme convenience, made the same passage serve for eating, speaking and breathing, although another arrangement was possible, like the respiratory apparatus of the grasshopper, which is placed at the sides. This is one of the very few exceptions to the rule which applies in common to man and most animals.

When the upper part of the throat was in an advanced state of development the act of respiration began to be accompanied by certain inarticulate sounds, at first resembling the rough breathing of a person whose air passages are obstructed by a bad cold. Instinct soon taught the animal that these noises could be increased by forcing slightly the inspiration or expiration of the breath, or by contracting the muscles of the throat and so emitting the voice in a rapid succession of indefinite sounds. We have the right to suppose that the yelping of sea lions represents very nearly the human voice in its early stages of development. The sounds of the voice of the human being are, like those of all animals and all instruments, the result of a vibration of chords, and are grave or acute according to the size of these chords.

This change was more rapid in animals living on the land, the voice of those whose habits continued to be amphibious remaining much the same. There came in the course of time to be a great variety in the voices of animals, determined partly by their size, but generally by the circumstances in which they were placed. The different species of the feline race living in forests cultivated the higher tones. The lion adapted his voice to the vast desert spaces where he roamed and gained a scanty subsistence. The dog in his wild state probably confined himself to the lower notes of the scale and expressed his hostility only by barking. Since his domestication, having acquired a sort of human sentiment, he yelps and whines in the higher tones to express feelings that are but imperfectly understood. The cat imitates the high sopranos. The horse, having a long neck and a head nearly as long, imitates in his neighing most of the modern tenors.

The animals of the bovine tribe produce the voice from low down in the throat, only occasionally venturing on certain higher and exceedingly unnatural notes. A great variety of tone and compass is found among the birds, from the shrill scream of those of a ravenous kind down to the parrots, among which are found the bassos, baritones and contraltos of the race. The singing birds combine the high and low tones with extraordinary flexibility of voice and a perfection of vocalism at which they arrived probably at a very remote period of the world's history.

Man inherited from his immediate ancestors, the apes and monkeys, a voice of considerable altitude, in which the lower tones were almost unknown. The monkeys chattered to their fellows from tree to tree in shrill head tones, the natural vocal expression of a weak and timid race, in whose physical formation the head had begun to hold an important place. The upper notes of the register were characteristic of the first men, as they still are of savage tribes and peoples, and of the half civilized members of modern society, whose voices have never been subjected to discipline.

The music of the Chinese, Japanese and of all wild tribes is keyed high and sung usually in falsetto, the lower notes being obtained by drums, tomtoms or some other instruments of the kind. Although their songs are far from agreeable to the ear, they still think they can sing, an illusion shared, it must be confessed, by a considerable number of persons in the most refined modern society.

These facts and suggestions contain probably the reason for the belief expressed by a French writer that the human voice is gradually descending the scale. High tenors and sky scraping sopranos are more and more difficult to find, a great misfortune in these times when the Wagner operas demand such extraordinary vocal efforts. The Chronicle has already endeavored to explain the awful consequences of this theory carried to its logical results. It has shown how the sopranos will gradually become contraltos; the contraltos tenors, regardless of sex; the tenors baritones, and the baritones bassos. It would be well if the misfortune ended here, but this is by no means all. When the whole human race is only able to speak in bass tones there will continue to be a depression of the higher of these, until one single dead level is reached, above which the voice will be unable to rise. To this unfortunate voice music in all its forms will long have been impossible. For awhile a conversation, whose ghostly solemnity can only be imagined, will be carried on, and then the vocal organs will cease entirely to exist.—San Francisco Chronicle.

COLLEGE GIRLS' FUN.

A Lot of Freshwomen Give a Sensational Rise to the President.

"They may talk about the college boys and their hazings and tricks, but for real, genuine fun you can't beat the college girls," said a young freshwoman the other day. "Last year—you know the men's college is right near our seminary and so they call on us every evening—the president made a new rule.

"He declared that we must dismiss our guests at 9:30, and we decided we would not do it. After a great deal of plotting and planning, we hit upon a delightful plan, and it was a great success. The boys secured a big basket and two ropes and a pulley for us, and this we hid during the day and at night fastened two great hooks on the sill of our study window. The boys sent up their cards in the basket, and then after inspecting them with a lantern to make sure they were not burglars we hauled them up.

"But one night the grave and dignified president caught us and planned a little surprise for us. He found one of the boys' cards in our rooms and placed it in the basket. It worked beautifully, and we hauled him half way up before any one thought of using the lantern.

"Then Miss Flyaway held it out the window and took a peep at him. One glance at the spectacles and bald head was enough. It was lucky for that president that we did not let him fall to the ground in our horror and amazement, but we held on to the ropes until we decided what to do.

"We couldn't let him down again, he would only come up and catch us, and we couldn't drop him, bad as he was, and we certainly didn't intend to help him carry out his plan by hauling him up, so we compromised by securing the ropes and letting him hang there in midair.

"He begged and implored to be let down, offered us any bribe we could wish for and wasted more eloquence on us in that first hour than he did during his yearly lectures. But we had no visitors that night. He amused us, and we wanted revenge, so we left him.

"He tried to jump, to climb down the wall and up on the rope, but failed in everything. At last he howled, yelled like an Indian, till every one in the town was aroused and even the boys turned out to see the terror of their worst nightmare, crimson with rage, suspended in midair in a clothesbasket."—New York Advertiser.

Man Milliners Hired by the Day.

It is not generally known, perhaps, that there are man milliners who hire out by the day or week as trimmers to New York modistes. It goes without saying that these trimmers are artists. Their greatest value lies in what they call original designing. The frames or shapes in stock are taken with whatever decorative material may be available, and unique bonnets and hats are evolved which may serve as models or be used for special orders. The men trimmers command a salary of $50 a week or $10 a day of six hours. They are regularly employed by modistes who, in connection with dress and cloak making, do some millinery work, but the largest class of patronage comes from the millinery shops. The intruder is scorned by the women in the workroom, who not only make personal remarks, but deprecate everything he turns out.—New York World.

Not What They Seemed.

A surprising discovery was made by Food Inspector Mellor not long ago. An honest Scovill avenue grocer had become suspicious of preparations which had been sold to him as being raspberry jelly and honey, and he took samples of them to the inspector. The jelly was made from corn starch and was colored with cochineal and flavored with raspberry extract. The alleged honey was made from glucose sirup flavored with oxalic acid. No flavor is necessary in the production of honey. It is only required that the glucose and oxalic acid be mixed in the right proportion and in a few weeks the result is honey, at least so far as taste and appearance go. The stuff had been sold to the grocer as strained honey.—Cleveland Leader.

John Hope's Methods.

The late John Hope of Edinburgh was a man of many peculiarities. He had a peculiar horror of boys smoking in the streets. Whenever he met an urchin with a pipe in his mouth, he would stop and lecture him on the evils of smoking. Generally he finished his homily by purchasing the pipe and destroying it in the boy's presence. This method of advancing the cause of the Anti Tobacco league did not meet with much success, as the boys usually invested the money in new pipes and a further supply of tobacco.—Edinburgh Correspondent.

Excessive Meat Eating.

"One deplorable result of excessive meat eating," say Mrs. Ernest Hart in The Hospital, "is the ill temper which is said to be a chronic complaint in England. In less meat eating France urbanity is the rule; in fish and rice eating Japan harsh words are unknown and an exquisite politeness to one another prevails, even among the children who play together in the streets."

FREE LUNCH.

Where Tons of Edibles for New York Drinkers are Prepared.

A VISIT TO A FREE LUNCH FACTORY.

The Food Found on the Counters of Saloons is Cooked in Over Thirty Establishments.

These facts are published for the enlightenment of the many thousands who eat free lunch. They have probably observed the fact without duly pondering on it, that this kind of nutriment wherever found in this city has a generic flavor. That is explained here.

The free lunch eaters of New York consume daily two tons of potato salad, a ton and a half of beans, 250 gallons of beef stew and a hundredweight of caviare, not to mention the pounds and pounds of cheese, frankfurter sausages, pickles, olives, corned beef, macaroni and all the other constituent elements of the $50,000 worth of free lunch that is dispensed each day in 7,000 saloons.

To supply this enormous demand twenty catering companies bake beans, boil beef and mix up salads and all sorts of food.

The pioneer in the business and the firm that supplies most of the free lunch consumed in New York has its hash foundry and headquarters on Washington street, where once stood a small church, near the Christopher Street ferry. It is a four story building that gives employment to forty men, ten women and twelve horses.

A small sign inside the office door betrays it. Otherwise the passerby would know not what it was. From outside appearance it might be a soap factory or a paper box warehouse, instead of being the source of sustenance to the 30,000 men who, it is estimated, live by free lunch alone. There are, besides 100,000 others who sample it day by day.

The building in question contains a neat business office, a great elevator that drops wagon, horse and all down in the cellar to be loaded for delivery, huge kitchens, ovens, ranges, boilers, ice houses and all the other necessary adjuncts to the manufacture of New York's free lunch.

A visit was made by a reporter to the factory the other day when the baking of the first batch of beans—500 pounds—was about to begin.

Pans and dishes were clanking, caldrons were steaming and everything was going quickly.

"Tomorrow is Friday," said the manager. "Fish is in great demand and we have to work off these beans and get at the pike, rockfish and salmon. We have 1,000 pounds of fish to cook and it means extra work."

Up stairs a machine chopper was at work on a huge mass of corn beef for hash purposes.

Piled upon a table were tubs of pickles, pigs' feet, olives and other thirst compellers. The icebox was yielding up its stores of fish and flesh. The free lunch factory was in full blast.

Everything went by system and everything was clear and clean as a new pin. Even the stairs were scrubbed to a snowy whiteness and, if it is true that each must eat his peck of dirt, one can rest assured that he will get but a small percentage in his free lunch.

The manager said that besides beans, beef and potato salad they also made and furnished everything that could be thought of in the way of dainties and delicacies for the finest class of trade.

The extent of the free lunch system in New York can in some degree be estimated from the variety of comestibles provided by this one catering company.

These comprise clam chowder, clam broth, beef pie, veal potpie, vegetable and tomato soup, boiled ham, beans in eight varieties besides the famous Boston style, boned turkey, macaroni, salmon salad, chicken salad, lobster salad, fried oysters, fried clams, clam fritters, boiled pig's head, baked livers, liver and bacon, roasted pig, soft crabs, fried eels and so on.

The process of bean baking and salad making was next seen. A ton of beans boiled merrily in four large caldrons. Quantities of these were scooped with large ladles into curiously shaped iron kettles, which were placed in the oven and parboiled. Then they were transferred to the familiar little brown jars and put into another oven. Here they were to bake twelve hours. It takes twenty-four hours in all to bake them into Boston beans.

For the potato salad potatoes—barrelfuls of potatoes—were being cooked. They were then peeled, and five or six bushels of sliced onions were added and the salad was done. Under the supervision of an Italian expert ten large pans of macaroni were being prepared. As soon as anything was finished it was placed on plates and dishes bearing the name of the firm, and put ready for the wagon to take out early in the morning.

The free lunch factory works every day but Saturday. Saturday is the free lunch makers' holiday.

Beans and beef must be prepared on Sunday for Monday delivery, but no work need be done on Saturday for Sunday.

New York leads the world in the making of free lunch. New Orleans and San Francisco are noted, too, and Cincinnati and Chicago come in for free lunch honors also. But none of these cities can boast of any shop where free lunch is made by the ton as it is here in New York every day of the year except Saturday.

Free lunch is a distinctive American institution. It was unknown in Europe until May, 1891, when Miss E. Joyce, the proprietress of the Mariners' hotel, in Liverpool, placed in the taproom a free for all spread between the hours of 11 and 1. She continues to do so, to the great joy of her many patrons, up to the present time.—New York World.

Full weather forecasts are now received at 1,622 stations in the United States, while over 5,000 places receive them gratuitously.

Unrealized Anticipations.

That Long Islanders are not wholly devoid of humor, which has been charged against them, is clearly demonstrated by a recent occurrence at Riverhead, the Suffolk county seat.

It seems that the local debating society had under consideration the old topic, "Whether there is greater pleasure derived from anticipation than from realization?" This weighty subject was discussed at length and was finally carried in favor of anticipation by a heavy majority.

Now, it happens that a favorite dish of Riverheaders is rabbit stew, and that one of the losing faction, Nate Downs, is esteemed as the best concocter of rabbit stew on the eastern end of Long Island.

Not long after the famous debate, Nate invited the whole company to visit his house and partake of the favorite dish. Anticipation ran high, and at the appointed hour the club assembled en masse, but alas for realization! there was no rabbit stew, only the usual paraphernalia of serving it—dishes, knives, etc.

Nate had sought by this practical method to force the society to reconsider its hasty decision and was eminently successful. The company left, very angry, but with the settled conviction that so far as rabbit stew was concerned realization would be more satisfactory than anticipation.—New York Herald.

Burial Armor and Shrouds.

The custom which still prevails of sewing up a corpse in flannel originated doubtless in the act of parliament, 18 and 19 Charles II, which was passed for the encouragement of the woolen trade and required all bodies to be buried in woolen shrouds. Two amending statutes were passed—1678 and 1680—requiring at the funeral an affidavit to be delivered to the priest stating that the requirements of the law had been carried out; otherwise penalties were incurred. These acts were repealed by 54 George III, although long before that time the penalties for noncompliance with the law had ceased to be enforced. During the operation of the acts for burying in woolen the law was sometimes evaded by covering the corpse with hay or flowers, notification of which is sometimes met with in the parish registers.

Burial in armor was not at all uncommon in the middle ages, and was considered a most honorable form of burial. Sir Walter Scott in "The Lay of the Last Minstrel" thus refers to it:

Seem'd all on fire that chapel proud,
Where Roslin's chiefs uncoffin'd lie,
Each baron for a sable shroud
Sheathed in his iron panoply.
—Westminster Gazette.

Aluminium Paint.

It is stated that aluminium, when reduced to powder and mixed with a solution in water of gum lac, gives a metallic paint which covers well and may be shaded with aniline colors dissolved in water. The solution of gum lac is made by bringing to boiling point a mixture of gum lac and borax and an alkali such as soda or ammoniac. The solution must contain at least from 15 to 20 per cent of gum lac. Aniline colors are added to produce the shade desired, and aluminium is added in sufficient quantity to produce a paint sufficiently fluid for application with a brush. The color is brilliant, very durable and impermeable and may be applied to metals, paper, wood and wooden materials. It may be rendered supple by the addition of a small quantity of glycerin.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Can Plants See?

The mysteries of vegetable life are not all yet explored. An Indian botanist has made experiments which induce him to say that some plants can see. Whether the inference can be accepted or not, these experiments go to show that the plants made an effort to reach supports placed at a little distance and grew toward the supports wherever placed. The plant was convolvulus, and when a pole was placed near it and in such a way that the tendrils would have to turn away from the light to reach it, they invariably did so and within a few hours twined about it. That certain plants have the sense of touch is well known.—Medical Times.

Before and After.

As an instance of the surprising increase in value that a picture acquires after an artist has become famous, the following is interesting: A dealer once went to the studio of David Cox and purchased a painting off his easel for £10. A few days afterward the old man went to him and said:

"You are young and have a wife and children. I think I have charged you too much for that picture, and I have brought you back £2."

Not many years after that same painting was sold for 450 guineas.—London Tit-Bits.

"You'll know me again if you meet me," said the guide.

DIAMOND MINING.

The Unearthing and Sorting Out of the Precious Stones.

HOW NATIVES LOOK WHILE AT WORK

Digging the Earth Hundreds of Feet Below the Surface.—How the Stones are Separated.

It is impossible to speak of Kimberley without speaking of the diamond mines. They concentrate around them almost the entire life of Kimberley, and they illustrate some of the most interesting questions which are connected with the development of enterprises in South Africa. The most logical way of seeing the process of extraction is to begin under ground and brave at once the slush and heat and drip of the 800-foot level. Here, while you splash, candle in hand, in the darkness through some two or three miles of labyrinthine passages, you have time to realize the work which is being done by thousands of natives who are busy day and night throughout a honeycombed depth of 1,100 feet in getting out the blue earth from its bed. There is no reef. The whole mass of the mine is diamondiferous, the rich stuff descends apparently to limitless depths, and all that has to be done is to bring it to the surface in such a manner that gallery shall still stand on gallery and allow of working without danger of collapse.

Above, below, on every side you hear the sound of pick and rock drill and rolling trucks. Black figures glue themselves against the walls to let you pass. The conditions of the scene combine to produce a vivid impression of labor. The natives work together in gangs of four, filling the trucks. Perspiration pearls over their naked bodies in some of the hottest galleries, but they appear to labor without distress. In the main galleries, which are admirably ventilated, they are for the most part fully dressed. They work either by time or task, as they please, their wages remaining the same in either case, and I was told that they often finish their allotted number of trucks in two-thirds the time which is allowed. Seeing what they do and how easily they do it, you can never doubt any more that the African native is able to work and work well when he chooses.

The pleasanter processes of diamond mining begin when you follow the contents of the trucks up to welcome daylight again and see the "blue," as it is familiarly called, laid out on the floors. The "floors" are simply fields fenced round with high, wire fences, where the extracted rock is spread out in beds of a certain thickness to pulverize under the action of the air. The contents of the trucks as they are emptied out run themselves into long rows; the color of the stuff is almost identical with the gray purplish hue of winter cabbages at home, and at first sight the flat and wide spreading floors might easily be mistaken for Essex cabbage fields.

The process of pulverization takes from four to six months, according to the weather and the condition of the rock, and it is assisted by operations of watering and rolling, which add to the agricultural illusion. The average yield of every load of blue is one carat of diamonds, and as the average net profit on a carat of diamonds is about twenty shillings the value of the million loads which I was told that I was looking at in the extent of a couple of cabbage fields is not far from £1,000,000.

As soon as the blue is sufficiently pulverized it is taken to the washing machine, where, by means of an ingenious system of water flowing over revolving pans, the lighter part of the earth is washed away, while the heavier remains in the bottom of the pans. By this process 99 per cent. of the blue earth is got rid of, and of 100 loads which go into the washing machine only one is saved to be sorted. The remaining ninety-nine, after passing through the various sieves and stages of the washing machine, pour out in a state of fluid mud at the bottom of the machine and are carted away by mechanical haulage, to be emptied on the daily increasing hillocks of diamond tailings, which, if other records of the industry were to vanish, might well puzzle future geologists to account for their composition.

The weight of diamonds keeps the precious stones for the most part with the heavy residue which has been saved. It is, however, well known that a considerable quantity of diamondiferous stuff escapes with the tailings, and if any economical process of treating them could be discovered the mounds of apparently water worn rock which dot the neighborhood would suddenly acquire a new value. So far no practical use for this waste earth has been discovered.

The one rich load to which the hundred raw loads have been reduced in passing through the washing machine was at one time sorted by hand. It is now subjected to a further preliminary of washing and sorting in a machine known as the pulsator. Here the diamondiferous stuff is passed under water over pulsating screens, in which a double layer of leaden bullets has been placed. The pulsating motion causes a constant gentle shaking to be maintained, and as the specific gravity of diamonds is greater than that of lead, while the specific gravity of much of the waste pebbly material is less, the effect is to shake the diamonds to the bottom of the shot, while the waste material remains above it and is gradually washed over the side of the screen by the running water. The diamondiferous stuff is served into these wet pans by means of a cylindrical sieve, which distributes the finest from one end and the coarsest from the other, with regulated gradations between, on the same principle as the main sieve of an ordinary flour mill.

The whole process of mechanical sorting is based upon the relative weight of the diamond to other stones of the same size among which it is found, and if the difference were as great as the difference between the weight of gold and the mineral substances from which it is divided by washing there would be little waste and much less hand labor. As it is, many stones, such as garnets and others of no value, of which the specific gravity is equal to that of diamonds, are found in the diamondiferous earth. These of course pass in the pulsator through the bed, and when all has been done that can be done by mechanical processes the material which is taken from the machine has still to be subjected to the slow, uncertain and costly process of hand sorting, with all its temptations to dishonesty.—London Times.

FRIDAY, JUNE 8.....1894

A chief argument against the remonetization of silver is that if that were done the enormous debts due to England by other nations would be paid by England in the cheaper metal. But now England is suffering as much from her own greed as any other nation, and is in imminent danger of greater disaster from the vast increase of gold value. Australia has borrowed hundreds of millions of dollars from England. Industry of all kinds is paralyzed in that country. Not enough revenue is produced to pay interest on the debt. The people are crying out that English capitalists own them body and soul, and that the people of Australia are virtually the slaves of the capitalists. Already there is talk of scaling down the debt—that is, repudiating a part of the amount claimed. This is justined on the ground that the labor of the people will not produce enough to pay interest on the debt and supply themselves with the bare necessaries of life. Four millions of men, women and children will not tamely submit to die of hunger, while the produce of their labor is taken in satisfaction of a Shylock bond. If the work of scaling down this vast debt once begins, the capitalists in England will curse the day they procured the demonetization of silver. The example of scaling would offer strong inducements for all debtors to follow.

It should be borne in mind that the riots now occurring in the Eastern States are caused by men who are supposed to get big wages through the benevolent operations of McKinleyism. The McKinley tariff puts a tax on coal and iron ore greater per ton than the whole cost of the labor required to get it on board for shipment. The striking miners in the coal and iron regions are all foreigners who have been imported to this country to to displace American miners because they would work for cheaper wages. These bloody riots are a logical result of protecting the monopolist by securing to him the American people for customers, and by opening the American ports to him so that he can get the most ignorant servile and savage laborers in the world to use in his mines and factories, to the exclusion of Americans.

From a long-distance view of the Pacific bank trials in San Francisco it begins to look as if the delinquent officials of that badly looted concern would soon meet with severe and impartial punishment, whether the misguided depositors ever get back their money or not. The arrest of R. H. McDonald, jr., and the subsequent indictment of his father, both go to show that there is a spirit of justice in the city which has long lain dormant but is now thoroughly aroused. Can we wonder at Coxeyism or anything else, when men who use other people's money in wildcat speculations and leave their creditors to suffer, seek to defy the law? Our word for it, there is more than one officer in that bank who is booked for San Quentin.

The mine owners who laughed the protest of Americans to scorn a few years ago, when the demand went up to stop their importation of vandals, Huns, and the degraded and brutish from European fields of ignorance and semi-slavery, are reaping after their own sowing. But because this is true not one particle excuses or palliates the offenses of those riotous murderous creatures, who are terrifying the unprotected people of the coal regions. Without the brute backing of these low class aliens the coal strike would not have taken on the form of violence and outrage it has now assumed.

No one should be misled into thinking that the wars that are being waged in Illinois and Colorado by the miners had anything to do with the industrial depression. It is simply a question whether the miners shall work eight or nine hours for three dollars. There is a plenty of men who are willing to work nine hours for three dollars, but the others threaten to blow up the mines and kill hundreds of people rather than permit them to do it or to work for those wages themselves.

Estate of Barna Peeler, deceased—Filed stipulation in matter of estate of said deceased.

BORN.

CARPENTER—At Black Rock, May 29, 1894, to Mr. and Mrs. Philip Carpenter, a daughter.

O. I. Mairs visited Bishop during the week.

Painters see notice for proposals in this issue.

County Treasurer Bunney is visiting at Bishop.

Mrs. J. B. Steward was down from Big Pine on Wednesday.

Mr. and Mrs. P. W. Forbes went to Bishop on Tuesday.

The delinquent tax list for 1893 will be found on another page.

Angus McDonald of Big Pine was in town a few days this week.

Bert Wertheimer spent yesterday at Independence going to Lone Pine to-day.

Rehearsals for the drama to be given on the evening of July 4 have now in order.

Dr. M. Clarke and S. P. McKnight were down from Bishop early in the week.

At the school election last Friday J. C. Roeper was elected trustee to succeed himself.

Mrs. I. H. Molholland arrived home last Monday from a month's visit with relatives and friends at Oakland.

Mrs. Reeves and her two little daughters arrived at Independence last Monday from Los Angeles and will remain for the Summer.

The regular train conveying mail and passengers will be down to-day. A special came down yesterday returning this morning.

Mr. and Mrs. B. Rhine arrived at Independence last Saturday. They have rented the Schroeder dwelling and will make their home at Independence.

After two weeks of cloudy, stormy weather the clouds disappeared on Wednesday night and yesterday and to-day Summer has been taking a hand in affairs.

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Hale, of Los Angeles, stopped at Independence yesterday on their way to Bishop. Mr. Hale is looking over the country with a view of settling here.

Mrs. Minnie Calloway arrived at Independence last Tuesday from Texas and will spend a few weeks in the valley visiting with her sister, Mrs. J. W. Calloway of Black Rock.

All parties having grists are requested to bring them in at once as I intend closing down my mill, two weeks hence, for the season.

A. N. BELL.

William R. Wynn and Messrs. Hughey and Ake arrived at Independence on Wednesday from Los Angeles. The party have gone up the Valley intending to look over the country as far as Round Valley.

The Republicans of Alpine, Mono and Inyo counties are very much excited over the Assembly nomination. It is just possible that some good live Democrat will be nominated, who will upset all their calculations, as was the case two years ago.

Mrs. Mary Watson, accompanied by her son-in-law, Mr. Bush, arrived at Independence yesterday from Orange county. They are well pleased with the country and will invest in land here. They will return home on Monday's stage.

There is now in training at Los Angeles the best lot of fast horses ever gathered there. The stables at the race track are filled and the track is filled the greater part of each part of the day with trotting and pacing stock in training. Several fine horses owned at San Francisco and other points north have wintered there and been in constant training. Horsemen expect the coming season to be the State.

Gold at Our Doors.

There is quite an excitement over the discovery of placer ground in Mazourka Canyon. About a week ago some Mexicans found good pay dirt and have since continued prospecting. J. C. Roeper went over to see the country on Wednesday. Mr. Roeper is an experienced placer miner and he says the prospect is first-class for opening up a good mining district. The formation is slate running across the gulches. Most of the gold found is about the size of wheat kernels. The country has been prospected over a stretch of four miles and it all pans well. Arthur Smith went over yesterday and he confirms the report of Mr. Roeper. He saw about fifty pounds of dirt taken off the bedrock washed in a pan and it yielded about $2 50. There are already about twenty men at the new diggings and more are going every day. The country is very easy of access. The Hood spring will supply enough water to run several patent rockers. The district will be thoroughly prospected within the next few weeks. Mr. Roeper and Tom Taylor went over again to-day.

Railroad Wreck

The north-bound train on the C. & C. R R. Tuesday morning was wrecked one mile south of Black Canyon, caused by a break in the Collins ditch. The tender was turned bottom side up and three box cars badly wrecked. The crew and passengers escaped injury with the exception of W. T. Bunney, County Treasurer, who was slightly hurt. He happened to be walking along the aisle of the coach and had one hand hurt as the result of the jar. A wrecking train was at once started from Hawthorne which reached the wreck at 6 or 7 o'clock Tuesday evening. The break was repaired at 2 o'clock Wednesday afternoon and train started north.—Index

Committee Meeting.

Notice is hereby given that a meeting of the Democratic Central Committee will be held at Independence, Cal., on Wednesday, June 20, 1894, at 7:30 p. m., for the purpose of appointing delegates to the State Convention and the transaction of such other business as may properly come before the meeting.

A. W. EIBESHUTZ,
Chairman.

Better Than Boom Times.

It is remarkable that notwithstanding the great business depression all over the world, Los Angeles is growing more rapidly than during the boom excitement of a few years ago. The aggregate value of real estate sales for April this year is more than thirty per cent over double the sales for April 1893. The sales for April this year amounted to over $2,300,000. Houses are being finished at the rate of from four to five each day, and as fast as finished they are occupied. There are no empty dwellings.

Visitors

Truman Berry and W. Strawbridge arrived at Independence last Saturday. They stayed here till Wednesday looking over the country and then went north, intending to go as far as Round Valley. Both are farmers from Whittier, near Los Angeles. Both said that all that had been told them at Los Angeles about the country they had found more than confirmed, and the country better than they expected. They said they were well pleased so far with all they had seen.

W. L. Hunter, of Georges Creek, and A. L. McGee, of Bishop, announce themselves this week as candidates for the office of Sheriff. Both men are pioneers of Inyo county and as such know the country thoroughly. They are both men of tried courage and well-known probity of character, and should either of them be elected to the office of Sheriff he will fill the position with honor to himself and credit to the county.

The Most Successful Gas Engine

In the market is run without an electric spark battery. Theory is all very well, but the everyday experience of constant practical use is the best test of merit. The man who runs a launch and finds himself drifting with tide and wind because the "spark" fails to ignite the charge of gas in his engine; the man who prints a daily paper and fails to get it off on time because the "spark" again fails; the man who has fruit that is injured for lack of irrigation because the "spark" fails in his engine that runs the pump; not only such parties but others who have trouble from like causes should bear in mind that the Hercules Gas and Gasoline Engine is free from such difficulties. The ignition is simple and sure. Send for catalogue. If you want second-hand engines of other makes at cheap rates we can supply you. We have a number taken in trade and cannot take any more until these are realized on. PALMER & REX TYPE FOUNDRY, 405–407 Sansome St., San Francisco.

A New Prophet and Mystic In Kief.

A new sect whose prophet is a certain peasant called Kondrati is making extraordinary progress in the provinces of Kief and Poltava. Kondrati is a man of considerable power as a speaker, but who was at one time confined in a lunatic asylum. He was arrested some time ago and sent to Transcaucasia, but his followers are most energetic apostles and continue to propagate Kondratism. Their principle tenet is that all men are as Christ was, and in exactly the same way sons of God when they have been touched by the Spirit. The plainest facts and statements in Scripture are interpreted in a mystical spirit. There is also a tendency to free love among them, but as the last statement is vouched for only by the Russian clergy it may have no foundation. The Kondratists already number 7,000.—Christian World.

WORSE THAN CHEWING GUM.

The Evil Effects of Masticating Paper Illustrated by an Old Story.

In the time of Charles XII of Sweden the private secretary of Count Goertz, then minister to England, was strongly addicted to the habit of chewing paper. Goertz had made the young man's acquaintance on a journey to Courland. He was the son of a landed proprietor named Buehren. Count Goertz took him to Stockholm and gave him a place in the cabinet. At first the young secretary chewed only white paper, but soon acquired a liking for paper even that had been written on.

A peace treaty had been formulated between Russia and Sweden, which the members of the assembly forced Charles XII to accept. The basis of the latter was a treaty which both states had agreed upon with regard to Finland. The original of this treaty was given by Count Goertz to his young secretary. When it was called for by the assembly, it could nowhere be found. The assembly believed that it had been destroyed by Goertz in order to overthrow the peace policy and give Charles XII a chance to go to war. Goertz was arrested, when his secretary came forward and confessed having masticated the document. He was tried and sentenced to death. The king would gladly have pardoned him had he dared in the face of the angry assembly, but he gave him an opportunity to flee from the country.

Buehren went to Courland with a letter of recommendation to the duke from Minister Goertz. The latter, believing that his severe punishment had entirely cured him of the bad habit of chewing up documents, appointed the young man secretary to his superintendent. When the duke, who was very extravagant in his expenditures, was notified by his superintendent of the hopeless condition of his finances, he asked for a statement of his affairs, and the young secretary was intrusted with all the bills, etc., to make up the statement. He again succumbed to his evil habit and chewed up one of the most important receipts among the duke's papers. In his despair he sought mercy at the hands of the beautiful duchess, Anna Ivanovna, the niece of Peter the Great, and she interceded for him with the duke.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

A Smart Chinaman.

"We have one of the smartest Chinamen in the country at Denver," said a gentleman at the Mansion hotel. "His name is Chinn Foo. He is very wealthy, but to judge from his clothes one would think him a candidate for the poorhouse. I was in the smoking room of a sleeper one day coming from Omaha to Denver when Chinn came in. The only other occupant was a real dude, of the one eyeglass, cigarette pattern.

"'Where are you going, John?' said the dude beamingly as Chinn sat down.

"'I am going to Denver, sir. Whither are you destined?' replied Chinn in the most graceful manner. Well, sir, his dudelets collapsed, and as soon as he could escaped. The fact is we, in our bigotness, think every Chinaman is an egregious idiot. The contrary is mostly true. They are capable of transacting almost any business, and sometimes exhibit a power seldom possible in an Englishman."—Fort Worth Gazette.

A Tricky Smuggler.

"Several years ago," said a treasury agent, "we suspected a man was smuggling diamonds from Canada. We called him into the office as soon as he left the ferryboat, examined the linings of his clothing and his person, from the rim of his hat to his toenails—every place of concealment we could think of—but to no purpose. We therefore came to the conclusion that we were misinformed and on the wrong scent. He went out of the office nonchalantly sucking an orange, which he had laid down while being inspected. A keen eyed lady detective attached to this department whispered to one of our officers, 'Suppose you try that orange.' It was done, and the man turned white with rage and disappointment when in it was found a small handful of the precious gems. In five minutes more we would have lost him."—New York Times.

ONLY GIRL AT OVERLOOK

By FRANKLIN TYLES.

"My name is Terence O'Reagan," he said, and in his voice was faintly distinguishable the brogue of the land whence the O'Reagans came. "I am a government detective. I have been sent to work up evidence in the case of some Italian counterfeiters. We had a clew pointing to a sub-contractor here, the very man who lies there dead. Our information was that he used some of the bogus bills in paying off his gang. Now it isn't going outside my mission to investigate his death, if you don't object."

"I would be glad to have you take hold of it," Brainerd replied. "We can't bring the authorities here before noon, at the earliest, and in the meantime you can perhaps clear it all up."

The eagerly curious men had crowded close to this brief dialogue, and had heard the latter part of it. O'Reagan became instantly an important personage, upon whose smallest word or movement they hung expectantly, and nobody showed a keener interest than Gerald Heath. The detective first examined the body. The pockets of Ravelli's clothes contained a wallet, with its money untouched, besides a gold watch.

"So robbery was not the object," said O'Reagan to Brainerd. "The motive is the first thing to look for in a case of murder."

Next he found blood on the waistcoat, a great deal of it, but dried by the fire that had burned the shoulders and head, and in the baked cloth were three cuts under which he exposed three stab wounds. Strokes of a knife had, it seemed, killed the victim before he was thrust partially into the furnace.

A storm was coming to Overlook unperceived, for the men were too much engrossed in what lay there on the ground, ghastly and horrible, to pay any attention to the clouding sky. Gloom was so fit for the scene, too, that nobody gave a thought whence it came. To Gerald Heath the going out of sunlight and the settling down of dusky shadows seemed a mental experience of his own. He stood bewildered, transfixed, vaguely conscious of peril, and yet too numb to speak or stir. Detective O'Reagan, straightening up from over the body, looked piercingly at Gerald and then glanced around at the rest.

"Is there anybody here who saw Tonio Ravelli last night?" he asked.

"I did," Gerald replied.

"Where and when?"

"At the same place where I met Eph, and immediately afterward."

"Ah! now we are locating Eph and Ravelli together. That looks like the lunatic being undoubtedly the stabber."

"And we must catch him," Brainerd interposed. "I'll send riders toward Dinmerville immediately."

"No great hurry about that," the detective remarked; "he is too crazy to have any clear motive or any idea of escape. It will be easy enough to capture him."

Then he turned to Gerald and questioned with the air of a cross-examiner "Did the two men have any words together?"

"No," was the ready answer; "I don't know that they even saw each other at that time. Eph went away an instant before Ravelli came."

"Did you talk with Ravelli?"

"Yes."

"About what?"

"Not about Eph at all."

"About what, then?"

Now the reply came reluctantly. "A personal matter—something that had occurred between us—an incident at the telegraph station."

"The station where Eph awakened the girl operator? Was it a quarrel about her?"

"That is no concern of yours. You are impertinent."

"Well, sir, the question is pertinent—as the lawyers say—and the answer concerns you, whether it does me or not. You and Ravelli quarreled about the girl?"

"The young lady shall not be dragged into this. She wasn't responsible for what happened between Ravelli and me."

"What did happen between you and Ravelli?"

The two men stood close to and facing each other. The eyes of the detective glared gloatingly at an upward angle into the pale, but still firm face of the taller Gerald, and then dropped slowly, until they became fixed on a red stain on the sleeve of the other's coat. Did he possess the animal scent of a bloodhound?

"What is that?" he sharply asked. He seized the arm and smelt of the spotted fabric. "It is blood! Let me see your knife."

Quite mechanically Gerald thrust one hand into his trousers pocket and brought out the knife which he had taken from Ravelli, whose blood was on it yet.

The storm was overhead. A first peal of thunder broke loudly. It came at the instant when Gerald Heath was aghast with the revelation of his awful jeopardy—at the instant of his exposure as a murderer. It impressed them and him with a shock of something supernatural. The reverberation rumbled into silence, which was broken by O'Reagan.

"There'll be no need to catch Eph," he said in a tone of professional glee. "This man is the murderer."

Again thunder rolled and rumbled angrily above Overlook, and the party stood aghast in the presence of the man dead and the man condemned.

"Bring him to the telegraph station," O'Reagan commanded.

Nobody disputed the detective's methods now—not even Gerald, and a prisoner as completely as though manacled, although not touched by any one, he went with the rest.

Mary Warriner had taken down the tarpaulin front of her shed when the men approached. In the ordinary course of her early morning doings she would wait an hour to dispatch and receive the first telegrams of the day, and then go to breakfast alone at the table where the engineers and overseers would by that time have had their meal. She was astonished to see nearly the whole population of Overlook crowd around her quarters, while a few entered. But she went quickly behind the desk and took her place on the stool. The soberness of the faces impressed her, but nothing indicated that Gerald was in custody, and her quick thought was that some disaster made it necessary to use the wire importantly.

"I wish to send a message," said O'Reagan, stepping forward.

The eyes of the girl rested on him inquiringly, and he palpably flinched, but as obviously nerved himself to proceed, and when he spoke again the Irish accent became more pronounced to hear, although not sufficiently to be shown in the printed words. "I will dictate it slowly, so that you can transmit it as I speak. Are you ready?"

Mary's fingers were on the key and her bright, alert face was an answer to the query.

"To Henry Deckerman, president," the detective slowly said, waiting for the clicks of the instrument to put his language on the wire; "Tonio Ravelli, a sub-contractor here, was murdered last night."

Mary's hand slid away from the key after sending that, and the always faint tint in her cheeks faded out and her eyes flickered up in a scared way to the stern faces in front of it. The shock of the news that a man had been slain, and that he was a man who only the previous day had proffered his love to her, was for a moment disabling. But the habit of her employment controlled her and she awaited the further dictation.

"His body was found this morning in the furnace of the steam boiler," O'Reagan resumed deliberately, "where it had evidently been placed in a vain attempt to destroy it."

A shudder went through Mary, and she convulsively wrung her small hands together, as though to limber them from a cramp. But her fingers went back to the key.

"The murderer has been discovered," the detective slowly continued, and the operator kept along with his utterance, word by word. "He killed Ravelli for revenge. It was a love affair." Here the girl grew whiter still, and the clicks became very slow, but they did not cease. O'Reagan's voice was cold and ruthless. "The motive of the murderer was revenge. His name was Gerald Heath."

All but the name flashed off on the wire. Mary Warriner's power to stir the key stopped at that. She did not faint. She did not make any outcry. For a moment she looked as though the soul had gone out of her body, leaving a corpse sitting there. A grievous wail of wind came through the trees, and a streak of lightning zigzagged down the blue clouded sky.

"Go on," said O'Reagan.

"I will not," was the determined response.

"Why not?"

"Because it is not so. Gerald Heath never murdered Ravelli."

Gerald had stood motionless and silent. Now he gave way to an impulse as remarkable as his previous composure had been singular. If there had been stagnation in his mind it was now displaced by turbulence. He grasped Mary's hands in a fervid grip, then dropped them, and faced the others.

"I did not kill the Italian," he said. "He attacked me with my knife, which he had stolen. In the struggle his hand was cut, but I took the weapon away from him. He quitted me alive and unhurt. I never saw him again. You don't believe it? Mary does, and that is more than all else."

"The circumstances don't favor you," the detective retorted; "they convict you. You killed Ravelli because you and he were both in love with this young lady."

"Isn't it the rejected suitor who kills the other one for spite?" This was in Mary Warriner's voice, weak but still steady. "Ravelli loved me, I knew, and I drove him away. Mr. Heath loved me, I believed, and I had not repulsed him. If I were the cause of a murder between them, it should be Ravelli who killed Gerald."

"You detested Ravelli?" O'Reagan asked with a strange bitterness.

"Yes."

"And you love Heath?"

The answer was no more hesitant than before, "Yes."

"Send the rest of my message," and the detective was boisterous. "Send the name. Gerald Heath is the murderer."

He roughly seized her hand and clapped it on the key. She drew it away, leaving his there. A blinding flash of lightning illuminated the place, and what looked like a missile of fire flew down the wire to the instrument, where it exploded. O'Reagan fell insensible from the powerful electrical shock. The rest did not altogether escape and for a minute all were dazed. The first thing that they fully comprehended was that O'Reagan was getting unsteadily to his feet. He was bewildered. Staggering and reeling he began to talk.

Mary was first to perceive the import of his utterance. He was merely going on with what he had been saying, but the manner, not the matter, was astounding.

He spoke with an Italian accent and made Italian gestures.

"You-a send ze mes-sage," he said. "Heath ees ze murder-are. Send-a ze mes-sage, I say."

Tonio Ravelli had unwittingly resumed his Italian style of English.

His plentitude of hair and whiskers was gone, and in the face thereby uncovered nobody could have recognized him in Detective O'Reagan but for his lapse into the foreign accent, and he said so much before discovering his blunder that his identification as indeed Ravelli was complete.

Who, then, was the dead man? Why, he was Eph.

Nothing but the fear of being himself condemned as a murderer of the maniac, as a part of the scheme of revenge against Gerald, induced Ravelli to explain. He had found Eph lying dead in the path after both had parted from Gerald. The plot to exchange clothes with the corpse, drag it to the furnace, burn away all possibility of recognition, and thus make it seem to be his murdered self, was carried out with all the hot haste of a jealous vengeance. Ravelli was not an Italian, although very familiar with the language of Italy, and able by a natural gift of mimicry to hide himself from pursuit for a previous crime. Overlook had been a refuge until his passion for Mary Warriner led him to abandon his disguise. Thereupon he had turned himself into Terence O'Reagan, a detective, whose malicious work wrought happiness for Gerald Heath and Mary Warriner.

A Frisco Miracle.

THE TERRIBLE EXPERIENCE OF A WELL KNOWN BUSINESS MAN.

So Badly Crippled With Rheumatism That He Lost All Power of Feet and Legs—How He Was Cured.

(From the San Francisco Chronicle.)

M. E. Douglas, a young man who owns and runs a harness shop out at 2612 Mission street, in this city, tells a tale of a remarkable cure of rheumatism after he had suffered for several years, and had almost given up hoping that it could be cured. That Mr. Douglas' cure is permanent is amply demonstrated by the fact that it was effected two years ago, and rheumatism has not troubled him at all since that time.

It was in regard to his recovery that a Chronicle reporter called upon Mr. Douglas a few days ago. The young man told the following story:

"About four or five years ago I began to be much troubled by severe pains in my feet and ankles, and it annoyed me so greatly that I could only keep at work with difficulty. I began to think that I was standing on my feet too much, and would have to manage to do easier work. I was in a harnessmaker's shop then. About that time I read of a disease of the feet which is contracted in the German army. I decided that I had the same disease, and read up the remedies used for it and tried them. Of course they did no good. I then tried hot water bathing, and also used mustard water. I got some relief from the bathing, but it was only temporary and my trouble was constantly increasing. At last I went to a physician, and he gave me a prescription but it did no good. I was now so badly off that the acute pain had gone up beyond the calves of my legs. I used to have to sit down very often, and frequently when I would try to stand up I would fall right over. I completely lost power over my feet and legs, and was almost paralyzed. Finally I determined that I would have to let the disease wear itself out.

"You see we are all natives of Canada. My father, mother and I used to live at Woodstock, Ontario. We got the Woodstock Sentinel Review which contained a number of reports about the wonderful properties of a medicine called Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I thought that if one-quarter or one-tenth of what was said about them was true they might do me some good. We got $2.50 worth of them, and I began to take them without much regularity and without thinking much about their curing me. I just took them when I thought of it, two or three at a time as they happened to come handy. I was also suffering from a severe attack of piles which gave me a great deal of trouble. After I had been taking the Pink Pills awhile I noticed that the piles left me, and then my rheumatism just went away from me so easily that I hardly thought of it until it was gone. I had given up all other treatment and was taking nothing but the pills, so it must have been the pills that cured me. I took more, and, in fact, take some still. We always keep them in the house now. They give your cheeks a fine, healthy glow, and keep you feeling well all the time. My rheumatism was completely cured, and has not troubled me for two years.

"My grandfather, John Douglas, is still living in Canada. He was quite well acquainted with this very Dr. Williams who first compounded the pills, and knows that he has the very best of standing in the community.

"I cheerfully recommend the Pink Pills, and I think that any one who takes them is sure to receive benefit. As I said, we still keep the pills in the house all the time, and would not be without them.

Mr. Douglas is twenty-six years of age. He has been in San Francisco for the best part of his life. He is well and favorably known by a great many San Francisco people. Any one of an inquiring frame of mind can find him at work in his harness shop at 2612 Mission street.

An analysis of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People shows that they contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effects of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, and all forms of weakness either in male or female. Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent post paid on receipt of price, (50 cents a box, or 6 boxes for $2.50) by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Miss Eva Blackman, member of the Police Board of Leavenworth, Kan., removed two members of the police force because they were bachelors and appointed married men to fill the vacancies. Her husband received one of the appointments.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

The temperance folks have said it,
Perhaps in self-defense,
That the contents of the bo tle
Are always malcontents.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO HIMSELF.

The most inhuman outrages, outrages which would disgrace the savage, man perpetrates upon his own system by swallowing drastic purgatives which convulse his stomach, agonize his intestines and weaken his system. Many people constantly do this under the impression that medicaments only which are violent in their action, and particularly cathartics, are of any avail. Irreparable injury to health is wrought under this mistaken idea. The laxative which most nearly approaches the beneficient action of nature is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which is painless but thorough, and invigorates the intestinal canal instead of weakening and irritating it. The liver and the stomach share in the benign discipline instituted by this comprehensive medicine, whose healthful influence is felt throughout the system. Malarious, rheumatic, kidney and nervous complaints succumb to it.

"Have you ever seen the prisoner at the bar?" said the lawyer to the witness. "Sir," replied the latter with deep feeling, "I am a strict temperance man."

PUBLIC TESTIMONY OF A PUBLIC MAN.

The late Hon. James W. Husted, so long Speaker of the Assembly of the State of New York, was noted for vigorous common sense. In January of 1890, he wrote from the Assembly Chamber:

"I desire once more to bear my testimony to the value of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. I have used them for twenty-five years past, and can conscientiously commend them as the best external remedy that I have known. I have them constantly by me, whether at home or abroad. My family as well as myself have found them to be a sovereign remedy, both for external and internal troubles. I never had but one kidney difficulty in my life, and the application of the plasters cured me in a week. I desire, as I said before, to bear my testimony in a public way to their efficacy, and I know of no better way of doing it than by giving you my personal experience."

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are a vegetable purgative.

"All the world's a stage," remarked one member of Coxey's army. "Yep," replied another. "And we're walkin' gentlemen."

The Triumph of Conservative Surgery is well illustrated by the fact that RUPTURE or Breach, is now radically cured without the knife and without pain. Clumsy, chafing trusses can be thrown away! They never cure but often induce inflammation, strangulation and death.

TUMORS Ovarian, Fibroid (Uterine) and many others, are now removed without the perils of cutting operations.

PILE TUMORS, however large, Fistula and other diseases of the lower bowel, are permanently cured without pain or resort to the knife.

To the Efficacy of the World-Renowned Swift's Specific.

The old-time simple remedy from the Georgia swamps and fields has gone forth to the antipodes, astonishing the skeptical and confounding the theories of those who depend solely on the physician's skill. There is no blood taint which it does not immediately eradicate. Poisons outwardly absorbed or the result of vile diseases from within all yield to this potent but simple remedy. It is an unequaled tonic, builds up the old and feeble, cures all diseases arising from impure blood or weakened vitality. Send for a treatise. Examine the proof.

OUR BABY BOY

Perfectly Cured of Impure Blood by Hood's Sarsaparilla

"Our little baby boy is now almost two years old. When he was about six weeks old there appeared a breaking out on his head and breast. A doctor said it was scrofula, but his treatment failed, and we called upon three other physicians, who termed it salt rheum or eczema. Even then he grew worse. A crust would gather on his head as thick as a quarter and puff up with corruption. Then it would come off, taking the hair with it. About three months ago we resolved to try Hood's Sarsaparilla and Hood's Olive Ointment. To-day we are happy to say that Burtron is now

AT THE WINDOW.

Here from my chair I see them go—
The rich, the poor, the great, the small—
Under my window; they don't know
A little watchman sees them all.

These two are looking—aren't they queer?
They—How do you do? I guess they say—
They wonder why I stay in here
Instead of running out to play.

My two big brothers and the rest
Are playing there beyond the wall;
My brother Jack can play the best;
You ought to see him curve the ball!

And when he makes a splendid play
And I can help them raise a cheer,
My pains and troubles go away,
And I forget what keeps me here.

If I could just be well one day,
And go out, too, it would be fine.
Well—I can see the others play
And take their fun instead of mine.

I watch them here from up above—
You see it's almost just the same,
I love them so—and I can love
As well as if I wasn't lame.

THE WOMAN IN BLACK

Traveling recently from Chicago to New Y[illegible] I found in the morning, upon crawling out of my berth, that the train was [illegible]k still. The porter told me [illegible]n standing thus for an hour [illegible] I had been sleeping the [illegible]

[illegible]eeped out and saw that [illegible]e platform of a country [illegible]ood breakfast in the [illegible] went out to stroll up [illegible]n.

[illegible]ngineer alone, wait[illegible]ssiped with him a [illegible]. Then I offered [illegible]k with thanks [illegible] I swung myself [illegible]

[illegible]leasant faced [illegible] explained to [illegible] valves and [illegible]ll as bright [illegible]ake them, [illegible]s engine [illegible] of her [illegible]ining [illegible]reen [illegible] to [illegible] a [illegible]

[illegible] a few splinters of wood and twisted [illegible] to the abutment, while now, far [illegible] blackness, that awful black [illegible] woman danced again on the [illegible]ed against the shaft of light [illegible]ht threw.

[illegible] arms about as if in [illegible] at the chasm and [illegible] you saw when you [illegible]ked.

[illegible] more than luck [illegible] Frank.'

[illegible]owly to the train, feel[illegible]nd thankful, too, I can [illegible]eral of the passengers had [illegible]orward by this time. Among [illegible] young fellow from Chicago, [illegible]een years old, who was smarter [illegible] whole of us, as it turned out.

[illegible]n this boy saw the woman in [illegible] he turned and looked at the loco[illegible]ive headlight. Then he ran up toward [illegible] looked at it as he did so. I saw a peculiar spot on the glass.

"'There's your woman in black!' said the Chicago boy.

"And there it was, sure enough—that same moth miller that you see there in that frame. He was clinging to the inside of the glass. As I peered on the glass the creature flew back and lighted on the reflector.

"That's the whole story, sir. The moth, by fluttering on the glass just in front of the electric illuminator, had produced a great black shadow, like that of a cloaked woman, on the darkness in front of us, and when he flopped his wings in his vain attempt to sail out through the glass, he gave his mysterious shadow the look of waving the arms wildly.

"Then when he flew back out of the direct shine of the light the figure disappeared, of course.

"We never knew just how he got in there, but no doubt it happened when Jim went to fix the light at the pumping station.

"Anyhow he saved our lives by scaring us with that woman in black.

"So you see why I keep the moth in the frame. It's to remind me of the way we were saved that night. Yes, you might call it accidental, but I call it providential."

"All aboard," called the conductor of the limited, coming out of the telegraph office with a paper in his hand.

Jim the cabman ran and jumped into the cab as I stepped down to go back to my car.—Youth's Companion.

Selling and Buying.

Trade had been dull, owing to the disagreeable weather, and my department had been among the quietest in the store, so when I had a customer that day I wanted to sell badly.

A lady approached and I put my best foot forward.

She wanted studs for a gentleman's shirt. I displayed the stock, but could not make the sale because she wanted only two studs, and the set consisted of three, not to be sold separately.

She did not want the three even if they cost only a trifle more than two.

Two were all she would need. I told her to lay the other aside and the gentleman would soon have use for it, as he was liable to either lose or break one and the extra one would come in good.

"No. He would neither lose nor break them," despite my assurance that shirt studs and buttons were forever among the missing, according to all authorities on the subject that I am acquainted with.

My three dollars per week eloquence finally prevailed, and one more sale was added to my day's slender showing.

I saw tears gathering in her eyes. I hardly thought I was responsible for them, and out of sympathy asked her. She told me the studs were for her brother and he was to be buried the next day.

That was the reason two would have been enough for her, and after all she new better than I did.

That woman is still a customer at the [illegible] but I really have not the heart to [illegible] her, and I guess she doesn't want [illegible]ther.

[illegible]men's shirt studs are still in my [illegible]t, and whenever I sell them, I [illegible]articular sale and feel rather [illegible] the part I took in it.—Cor. [illegible]corder.

"We were scheduled [illegible] about 1 o'clock in the morning, and to [illegible] rive in S—— at about 6. On the night when this thing took place a fearful storm of wind and rain had been raging since early evening, and was at the height of its fury when I started for the roundhouse.

"It was about midnight and the wind seemed to sweep clear around and through the building. It was terribly dismal. Jim was there, and the engine was all ready, so, after getting my working clothes on, I ran the machine down to the station. Our train, the vestibule limited, was an hour late. I gave the engine a thorough oiling, and made sure that all was in order.

"As we sat in the cab we could hear the storm raging outside, while the rain driven by the gusts of wind, beat fiercely against the windows.

"'It's going to be a bad run, Frank,' Jim said. 'I wish we were in S—— safe and sound.'

"I laughed. 'What makes you so terribly glum, Jim?' I asked.

"'Oh,' said he, 'I just feel creepy somehow. Seems like there's something terrible going to happen. I can feel it in my bones.'

"I laughed again. 'You got a little wet coming over, I guess, Jim,' said I. 'And the sound of the wind isn't very encouraging, that's a fact.'

"To tell the truth I was a little nervous myself, notwithstanding my easy way of [illegible]ting Jim's notions.

"Presently our train came in, long and [illegible] consisting mainly of sleepers. It used to make me nervous to know that the lives of hundreds of my fellowmen were in my keeping, but now I think nothing of it. That night I was nervous. What if the frightful storm had made a switchman careless, or if a rail had been loosened by the settling of the track somewhere? On these fast trains a man must rely on the vigilance of the employees; for in order to make schedule time he must run at such a speed that often he cannot see a signal before he is upon it.

"But I laughed at myself for my fears as I backed down and coupled onto the train. I set the brakes and found everything in good order.

"By and by the little gong above my head clanged sharply, and with a puff and hiss of escaping steam we were off into the night and storm, rattling over switches, past signal lights and between long lines of cars, till, with a roar and rumble we rushed over the long iron bridge and away through the hills, waking their slumbering echoes with our shrill whistle.

"[illegible]hen I pulled the throttle wide open [illegible]ank and roar soon settled into a [illegible] 449 was doing her best and [illegible]ty miles an hour.

[illegible] intense save where [illegible]c device, cast its [illegible]m. Jim had [illegible] to a high [illegible] sleep[illegible]

Historic and Unique Old Newspapers Stored in the Capitol.

ALL OUR WAR MAPS PRESERVED.

The Collection Makes One of the Most Interesting Exhibits Among Uncle Sam's Treasures.

One of the most interesting departments in the Washington capitol is the newspaper file room. The habit of keeping files was contracted by the senate in its early days, when journals first began to print reports of legislative proceedings. The government became a subscriber for The National Intelligencer, a daily paper printed in the city of Washington. This historic sheet was started in the year 1800 and continued for many years to be the only paper in the country that gave quick reports of congressional doings. This was in the days before the telegraph, and the newspapers published away from here were dependent for their legislative news upon this paper. In 1845 The Union was established and continued for 11 years.

Files of these two old papers, with some others of the north and south, were carefully kept in the senate, and were the source of constant information for both senators and representatives, who depended upon them in many cases far more confidently than upon The Globe. About eight years ago these files, which had been moved from place to place and were in danger of being destroyed, were transferred by resolution of congress to the care of the librarian of congress, who had them placed with the files that he had been keeping and stored away under the crypt. Over 1,100 volumes were transferred.

Mr. Van Ness, the guardian, has a den under the rotunda floor. He was found at work by the reporter. A great clothes-basket stands on top, filled to overflowing with the latest issues of the press.

"That is my morning mail," remarks Mr. Van Ness as he lays his hand affectionately upon the mass of reading matter. "It is a rather poor morning too. Sometimes there are two baskets. I take these papers as soon as I can each day and sort them out. You may see these shelves and big pigeonholes behind you. Well, each one is for a certain paper. Some of the boxes, you notice, are filled. The files in those are nearly ready to be sent to the government bindery to be put between covers. Some of the papers bind up at two months and others at four.

"Then every two months," he went on, fumbling through a drawer in the table, "they send me their current files from the senate, which I have to collate very carefully. I take them from their temporary binders and go through them particularly to see what numbers are missing. Then I write to the publication offices of the papers and try to supply the deficiencies. When the volumes are as complete as I can make them, they go to the binder.

"You can see from this list the number of papers we get here," as he handed out a carefully kept book that contained the names of upward of a hundred of the best journals published in the country. It showed the date of subscription and the date of sending the volumes to the binder, as well as that of its return. "The senate takes 31 papers now in addition to these. It keeps me pretty busy attending to them all. Let us walk through the vaults, and you can see what a quantity of material we have here."

The books were arranged in alphabetical order of states, beginning with the earliest newspapers of Alabama, published in 1819. A few steps took the two around in a circle, which completed the list of states and brought forth the names of the European capitals.

"For we have some very complete files of foreign papers," said the custodian. "We have the London Times from its beginning, from before it was The Times, in fact. Then here are files of the Manchester Guardian, and here is a set of Galignani's Messenger. We receive a great many files from the state department that furnish us with many valuable additions. Here is a complete file up to a short time ago of Le Constitutionnel, a French paper. And here are the magazines both of this country and Europe. Here is about the best collection of The Gentleman's Magazine in the country.

"Now you have seen the files that are referred to the most. Off down there," indicating the mysterious passage that led to the other side of the capitol, "are the old fellows that are in duplicate up stairs in the library. The Intelligencer is there in a special case. Here," showing the way into a perfectly dark vault about 4 feet wide and turning off to the left at the lower end, "are copies of every map that has ever been copyrighted in this country. The gem of this collection is not very well known. It consists of all the maps that were used during the various wars in which this country has been engaged. The maps were issued by the war department and turned back after they were needed no longer, and then turned over to us for preservation. There are some curious relics down there," added the custodian tantalizingly, as he turned back out of the dark.

"You think you have seen all my books, but you have not. Come across the corridor and see our little annex," and the way was led to a little bit of a room that has been built among the pillars of the crypt, where the papers of the new west are stored.

"Our policy has been to take two papers from each large place, one of each party; but out in the west we have to take three, now that the Populists are given to publishing their views on things.

"Here is a curio," said Mr. Van Ness, laying his hand fondly upon a pile of three portfolios labeled "The National Antislavery Standard."

"That is one of the most unique files of the lot, for it contains a vast amount of information about the first antislavery movements. It was published in New York from 1841 to 1870. This is the only file in the world that is at all complete. There are a few copies missing from the first six volumes and the last two, so we have not had them bound regularly. Then here is a record of other days than those of war and strife—a record of New York's political conventions and of fashionable doings."—Washington Star.

The Wealthy Man of the Future.

Out of the agricultural classes will rise the great American billionaires of the future. The influence of the farmer in American politics is already felt with ominous significance. Far more valuable to the world's progress is the man who cultivates 15,000 acres of land to feed the masses than the man who sits upon a great city with 2,100 tenement houses producing nothing, but profiting solely upon other people's industry and enterprise.—Minneapolis Times.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.

How a Crooked Faro Dealer Was Hoist With His Own Petard.

"I had a curious experience when I first struck Seattle," said a well know gambler. "I had been playing pretty lucky down in Denver and up in the Cripple Creek country and came up to the sound by way of Portland. Don't know why I came, but just came. I didn't find any of the boys whom I knew, but soon got acquainted and was moving around having a good time, but not playing any. I had a good deal of money and was enjoying a few days of leisure. One day I sat down to a faro layout and was keeping cases myself. I didn't know the dealer from Adam's orphan and didn't pay much attention to the game. I was simply chipping along waiting for the cases, keeping about even, and seldom making more than one bet at the start of a deal.

"After awhile my attention was called to one player. In fact, about all of them had dropped out but us two, and as I was noticing my own play only enough to see that my own bets were promptly paid I had to notice him. He seemed to have plenty of money and was dropping a good deal of it on the high card.

"Now, there are a good many things about a faro box that every one is not on to, but with a fellow who makes his bread and butter on the green cloth, as I have for years, it's an old acquaintance. I own a little one that I got from Gifford down in San Diego a year ago, and I practice with it semioccasionally up in my room, when I haven't anything else to do and nothing particular to think about.

"When I noticed the fellow lose his money, I turned my attention to the dealer. The man with the money must have been greener than the cloth in front of him, for he didn't tumble to the dealer, who was working very raw. He was putting up more than half the deck for the high card to lose. He did not pay a bit of attention to me, so I did to him. I have a pretty good memory, because I need it in my business. It was no trouble for me to watch him shuffle and remember eight or ten turns from the top, and of course I could catch the last turn. He was just putting up for the other fellow and thought I was just playing lucky, for I didn't play many cards open, but had my chips leading over from some out of the way card to the card I knew was going to win and was, of course, apparently as much surprised as the dealer when it was seen my chips led right.

"The dealer was busy and was accomplishing what he was striving for. I was busy, too, and equally successful. The result was that in two or three deals the moneyed gentleman had dropped close on to $1,000, while I was fully that much to the good, and the dealer was apparently not noticing that his hard work was accomplishing very little toward increasing the bank roll.

"About that time Rickebaugh of Los Angeles walked into the room, and stopping near me in surprise said: 'Hello, Lem, what are you doing in this country? Thought you'd gone into mines in Colorado and quit faro.' I looked up and was of course surprised to see him, but I knew the little game in which I was not taking much interest was up.

"The dealer looked at me a moment and said: 'Say, Rick, do you know this gentleman? He has been playing mighty lucky.'

"Rickebaugh glanced at the great stack of chips in front of me and sarcastically remarked, 'Lucky, h—l!'

"The dealer looked sold, and at the end of the deal quietly turned down the box and cashed the chips.

"Of course I didn't have the heart to call his last turn, though I knew it from the time the cards were boxed."—Seattle Press-Times.

Nelson's Nightcap.

Not long after the battle of the Nile Nelson invited Dr. Burney to stay with him at his house in Merton. Dr. Burney was both a composer of music and a writer of books on musical subjects and was on terms of friendship with all the great men of the day.

Having forgotten to bring a nightcap with him, he borrowed one of Nelson's. Before going to bed he put on the cap and sat down to read, as was his habit, but was soon surprised to find the cap in flames. These he put out at once, and then gathering the remains sent them to Nelson with these lines:

Take your nightcap again, my good lord, I desire.
I would not retain it a minute.
What belongs to a Nelson wherever there's fire
Is sure to be instantly in it.

DISEASE PROOF.

Why a Person Becomes Able to Resist a Deadly Sickness.

EXPLANATION OF THE PHENOMENA.

The Methods of Vaccination and Ancient Customs—Immunity First Produced by Chinese.

For a long time it has attracted attention that of a number of persons equally exposed to certain infectious diseases some are attacked by it much more severely than others, while many do not become sick at all; also that persons who have recovered from attacks of certain diseases do not generally, when exposed to them again within a limited period of time, contract these diseases, or at most the attack is a mild one. Generally a mild attack of a disease is as efficacious as is a severe one in preventing a second (mild or severe) attack of the same disease.

This condition of the body, in which it can resist more or less successfully attacks of infectious diseases, is defined as immunity. It may be natural or acquired, and an individual may be immune against one infectious disease, but not against another.

The Chinese were most likely the first who produced (3,000 years ago) immunity artificially, inasmuch as they dressed their children in shirts worn by patients sick with smallpox and made them snuff up the scabs in order to render them immune. The Brahmins also applied ropes made of hair and soaked in the poison of smallpox.

Another observation bearing on the question of immunity is given by Thucydides (450 B. C.), who says, concerning the plague in Athens, "The disease attacked no one twice, at least not in a deadly manner."

Until the time of Jenner (1798) scarcely any progress had been made toward the explanation or the artificial production of immunity. As is well known, Jenner investigated the popular belief which he found current in Gloucestershire as to the antagonism between cowpox and smallpox.

He found that individuals who had been inoculated accidentally with the lymph of cowpox and had recovered from the slight disease resulting were subsequently immune toward smallpox. To Jenner is due great credit for having established this fact, for having made it known generally and for having introduced artificial vaccination—viz., immunity against smallpox. His work has been of incalculable benefit to humanity, since smallpox is now a comparatively rare disease, while before his time it was one of the most common.

Except as to its connection with smallpox, immunity received but little attention until about 1877, when the advances made in other departments of bacteriology again drew the attention of experimenters to the subject. A great variety of theories has since been propounded with the view of furnishing a satisfactory explanation of immunity; not a few important facts bearing upon the subject have been discovered, and some practical results have been obtained. The whole question is yet, however, in a very unsatisfactory condition, and indeed is a highly complicated one.

So far two methods have been used chiefly for causing immunity. One depends upon the antagonistic action of one kind or one species of bacteria upon the other; the other upon application of substances (ptomaines, or more likely toxobumins) produced by bacteria grown in pure cultures. The immunity giving substances are isolated from these cultures in as pure a state as possible, and are used subcutaneously.

From cultures of the Loeffler diphtheria bacillus a highly poisonous toxalbumin has been separated, which, after it has been sterilized by heat and then injected under the skin, secures immunity against subsequent inoculation with the virulent germ of diphtheria.

The substance which is the immunity giving principle in the lymph used for smallpox vaccination has not been isolated yet, but there can be no doubt that here, too, we have to deal with a substance which is a product of bacteria life.

Of the numerous attempts made to furnish an explanation regarding the action of these immunity giving substances only a few will be considered.

Acquired immunity has been compared to an acquired tolerance of a poison. Tolerance of poisons (such as alkaloids) is constantly observed, but it is limited in degree, and obtained only as the result of a long continued succession of doses. Immunity is acquired after a single application of the immunity giving substance, and can therefore hardly be due to the adaptability of the body to accommodate itself, as it were, to the presence of poisonous substances.

Before it was clearly demonstrated that products of bacteria life, and not the bacteria themselves, cause immunity, the theory of "exhaustion" was given as an explanation. According to this theory, the bacteria on the "first invasion" of the body consume a number of substances which form a necessary nutriment of the invading species of bacteria. When it was shown that immunity was given by substances in the absence of bacteria this theory became untenable.

The following theory is the only one which today is in no opposition to facts observed: It supposes that the excretions or decomposition products of the bacteria remain in the body after the first invasion and prevent the return of the same species. If these decomposition products are formed outside the body and injected into it they also remain there, or at least cause such permanent changes that the bacteria cannot exist in it.

In other words, immunity may be brought about, or a cure may be effected, by introducing into the body those substances which are antagonistic to bacteria, and these substances themselves are chiefly the products of bacteria life.—Pharmaceutical Review.

A Minister's Son.

A small 3-year-old is the son of a clergyman whose sect need hardly be indicated after the recital of his young son's vocabulary. He was in the hall when a maid answered a ring at the door. Hearing an inquiry if his father was at home, he forestalled the servant by calling out:

"Yes, papa's up stairs. Come right in, poor sinner, and take a seat."

The same Calvinistic youngster was heard warning his older brother, who was climbing a picket fence, with, "Look out, son of mortality, you'll get a fall."—New York Times.

A Shrewd Patient.

"Henry," inquired the anxious wife, "what doctor shall I call?"

"Send for Dr. Squinine," replied the sick husband feebly. "He's courting old Bullion's daughter, and old Bullion is the chairman of the life insurance company I'm insured in."—Exchange.

A Tame Crow Boycott.

It is a well known fact that wild animals and birds do not care to receive back into their society a member that has lived a season with a man as a pet. This was illustrated in a noisy manner out near Pleasant Ridge, according to the story told by a witness: "A tame crow," said he, "had for several years cawed around the farmhouse of our neighbor and yesterday was seated on a fence away out on the farm cawing, when a great flock of crows came along and settled in the field. The tame one grew frantic, cawing and scolding till the attention of the flock was attracted to it.

"Rising en masse, the flock circled around and alighted on the fence about the tame one, which became frightened and flew up. It was followed by the others, which crowded about it in its flight and forced it to fly farther and farther away from the farmhouse and over a great wood. There they all set on it and pecked it and clawed the poor thing till its flight was marked with feathers falling. All this while they kept up a terrible cawing and calling, like a convention of reformed drunkards. They would undoubtedly have killed the poor bird, but it spied a man at work in the woods and dropped down to him. He proved a friend, and Jim Crow was soon perched on his shoulder, cawing defiantly at his relatives who had cast him from among them, but who now flew to a respectful distance."—Cincinnati Times-Star.

A Setting to Shakespeare.

I am persuaded that if Shakespeare lived today he would rejoice in the beautiful illustration of his plays that is now always accorded to them by the better theaters. Of course the setting of plays today is so utterly different from the Elizabethan setting that a revival of a Shakespearean play often necessitates some rearrangement and cutting of scenes. But if I may venture upon what will doubtless be called an amazing piece of impudence here again I fancy Shakespeare would be very tolerant. He was a consummate master of stagecraft and had the keenest sense for what was effective on the boards. But he was far more than this.

In spite of all their crudities and of their adaptation to wholly different modes of stage setting and stage management, his plays yet remain masterpieces, not, indeed, of paltry nineteenth century theatrical device and trickiness, but of sovereign, constructive dramatic skill. They still contain the best lessons in stagecraft for beginners. The design of Sardou is to the design of Shakespeare as the design of a gimcrack eight story boulevard "residence, with every fitting complete," to the design of a Gothic cathedral.—Nineteenth Century.

Sources of Ugliness.

Poverty alone does not produce the vulgar type. Destitution, suffering, want of leisure for mental culture, want of money for sanitary means of living have produced types of manhood and womanhood in whom personal beauty occurs only as an accident. Intellectual indolence, vice, evil communications and hygienic indifference are the source of personal ugliness. Ruskin on this subject says all along the social ladder may be found features seamed by sickness, dimmed by sensuality, convulsed by passion, pinched by want, shadowed by sorrow, branded with remorse, bodies consumed with sloth, broken down with labor, tortured by disease, dishonored in foul uses; intellects without power, hearts without hope, minds earthly and devilish.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Composition of Snake Poisons.

The venom of poisonous serpents (especially those native of America) has been made a subject of chemical and physiological investigation and critical study by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, the Philadelphia expert. Assisted by Dr. Reichert, Professor Mitchell succeeded in separating the venom of rattlesnakes and moccasins into three different and distinct poisons (proteids), which have been given the names of "venom peptone," "venom globuline" and "venom albumum." Dr. Mitchell probably knows more about the habits of serpents and the action of the poison of the venomous ones than any other man in America.—St. Louis Republic.

Condemned In His Own Court.

It is not often that a judge is condemned in costs in the very court over which he presides. This novel experience has come to the judge de paix, or county court judge, of Commentry, near Montlucon. The judge, M. Bouchard, had a dispute with his baker about an account, and the baker took out a summons against him. When the case came on for hearing, M. Bouchard stepped off the bench and begged his substitute to decide it. The substitute did so, and the result was that the judge was ordered to pay the amount in dispute, together with the costs of the proceedings.—London News.

Sweden's Match Trade.

The oldest and it is said the largest match factory in the world is in Sweden. Matches were made there long before the old, roughly trimmed splinter of wood tipped with sulphur was discarded with the tinder boxes for which they were used. In twenty-five years the export trade of Sweden in modern matches increased 1,000,000,000 boxes a year.—Philadelphia Times.

TO GO SLUMMING.

A Very Fashionable Diversion That is Rampant in New York City.

UNWARRANTED LIBERTIES TAKEN

It is a New Custom That is Repugnant to Human Nature, to Morals and to Good Taste.

A few years ago a new diversion was created by that class of persons in this city who are concerned to think of new diversions for themselves. This new pleasure has gained in popularity with each year and is now one of the most popular fashionable amusements of the day. That there should be no possible misunderstanding of what slumming really is, and since it is hardly to be supposed that the unassisted imagination would be equal to guessing it, the following presentation of this amusement is set down: A party of men and women dine together and go to the theater afterward. After the theater there is a supper, and after the supper, as they sit around the table sleepy, but unwilling to go home and to bed, some one has a bright idea.

"Let us go slumming!" he cries. There is a general assent, in which the voices of the women are loudest. The chairs are shoved back, the party packed into cabs and whirled off to the tenement districts of the east side. It is early morning, and there are but few pedestrians on the upper streets, where long lines of cabs going up town glisten for an instant under the lamp-posts and then melt into the darkness. Down, down into the narrow, deep streets east of Third avenue goes the party. These streets are still filled with lights and that harsh scraping of shuffling of feet that would teach one's ears, if one's eyes and nose did not declare it, that one is on the east side, where people have not yet learned how to walk. In spite of the light in the streets, the houses are dark and still, framing in occasional small squares of light where some worker or watcher perhaps has open eyes where other eyes are closed.

In front of one of these—any one will do; they are all unspeakably squalid and fetid and damp—the carriages halt and the party file into the low, narrow hall. At the first door the little groups pause and gather themselves together. One of the men strikes sharply on the door with his heavy stick. There is no answer; everybody is sound asleep. He strikes again and again, each time with greater decision than before. There are two or three sleepy tones inside, then a man's voice, an instant's shuffling of heavy feet across the floor, and then the locks are turned and the door is opened.

The man in the room strikes a light—he has been trained to do it—and the party in their fine evening clothes press into the little room. Beside the man there is a woman, and there are several children thrusting their little heads up through their rags like shy little animals in a covert. Sometimes there are more men and more women; they sleep anywhere—in the corners, on the table if there is one, on a board set upon a barrel, in the barrel like so many kittens, wherever there are square feet enough.

This may be necessity and it may be their taste, but whichever it is it is quite their own affair. The heads pop out everywhere, with perhaps a ragged body to follow, with the sleep sticking out all over it. Dull, dirty faces stare heavily and resentfully as the exquisitely dressed figures push in out of the darkness and gaze greedily and curiously all about them. There are little, inarticulate murmurs from the ladies, perhaps of compassion, perhaps of disgust. The leader asks a question or two sharply; then some one of the women edges toward the door. "That's all," says the leader as they file out into the hall and move on toward another door.

So they go on, up into the highest lofts they can find, down into the deepest burrows under ground. This party of well bred, refined men and women have a wonderful instinct for misery. Once on the scent they go straight to the most horrible lairs in the city. They see men and women, filthy and covered with disease, lying like animals in cellars where the water stands in pools all about them, and where there is not one ventilating hole to let in even the foul air that reeks outside. They see young girls and little children lying in beds with sick old people and in corners without beds. They see women sodden in drink and immodesty. They see mortal illness and suffering that should be sacred to pitying eyes. For a few short hours they see the whole world groaning and travailing together; they drink in misery and sup on sin. And then they go home.

Have they come through this valley of the shadow of sin and woe in the spirit of compassion and help? Have they come as officers of the law to see that such sanitary precautions as are possible are observed? Have they come with any human hope of amelioration? My friends, this unspeakable thing is true—they come to these places, they go up and down and to and fro and see these pitiful human beings for amusement, out of curiosity, to give themselves the pleasing shock of a new sensation, to be able to go away and importantly "tell about it."

This is slumming, and these are slummers.

It comes about in this way that such an outrage as this upon the decent instincts of human nature is possible. Necessarily these places are hotbeds of disease and contagion. In order to enforce such sanitary precautions as are possible the police and the health officers of the city and their deputies have the right to demand entrance in any of the tenement districts at any hour of the night or day. This has passed into a proverb among tenement dwellers. At the tone of authority their doors open. The doors once open they are able to distinguish between authority and curiosity, but they do not think of resenting it, such is the inborn habit of acquiescence in these foreigners. Besides there is something else—something that the callers do not take into account, something certainly that they themselves do not manifest—courtesy. Mr. Jacob Rils—than whom there is no better authority on these matters—says that among the poorest and most ignorant and most sodden foreigners there is always an instinct of the greatest courtesy.

Every Mother Knows It.

Mr. Dinwiddie—I see that Mrs. Gladstone has written an article on children in which she says they need change.

Mrs. Dinwiddie—Don't I know that? Don't they come to me two or three times a day and ask for a nickel or a dime?—Pittsburg Chronicle.

A Dubious Compliment.

He—I should be glad to hear that you enjoyed my novel.

She—Why, I was fairly in ecstasy when I reached the last pages.—Chicago Record.

The Sacramento Bee has laid down the duties of Congress, among which are the retaining of the McKinley act on the statute book and the enactment of a supplementary law compelling the "coal barons and other beneficiaries of the policy of protection" to pay their laborers "a living scale of wages in order that they may have some of the benefits accruing from a policy really intended in their interest". The Bee's demand for an act compelling the coal and other barons to pay a scale of wages to be fixed by law is a confession and full admission that Mc Kinleyism is a wicked fraud and a delusion to all the workingmen who put their trust in it. There has been altogether too much interference with the natural laws of trade, and that is one of the things that has brought this country to its present unhappy state. One law interfering with the natural flow of business and commerce makes another law necessary, and the two together require two more, and thus it goes on in a geometrical ratio, each interference requiring many more laws to remedy the troubles and injustices that the preceding enactments have caused. The sooner the people of the United States resolve to have their revenue system adjusted on a natural basis, so as to obstruct as little as possible the laws of natural trade, and to tax the people only for public purposes, and take only so much money from them by taxation as may be necessary to pay the cost of an economical administration of their public affairs, the sooner will prosperity be established on a firm and enduring basis, and labor and capital each enjoy all its natural righes. It is not "protection" that American labor needs, but emancipation from the burdens of government, tenfold increased by taxation that is put on the necessaries of life to enable "the coal barons and the other beneficiaries of the policy of protection" to coin the sweat of labor into dollars and take them from labor by an iniquitous and infernal system of indirect taxation that is not levied for a public purpose. When the government once establishes its revenue system so as to tax the people only for governmental purposes and not to make prices of things sold high or low in the interest of manufacturers or consumers, but to let natural laws govern trade, then will the country enter upon another era of prosperity. The constitution of the United States should be so amended as to take away from Congress the power, if Congress now has that power, to interfere with the prices that people must pay for the things they have to buy, and to unsettle the business of the country every time it assembles. The repeal of the McKinley act will be a short step in the right direction. The enactment of a new tariff law will not make the obligation of patriotic and intelligent citizens to demand a strict revenue system of taxation any less than it is now. The tariff question will never be settled until it is settled right.

The spirit that now controls the Republican party was shown last week at Los Angeles in a way that leaves no room for doubt. A county convention met to nominate candidates for State and county offices. Judge Clark, one of the present Superior Judges, was a candidate for Judge of the State Supreme Court. He is a very able Judge and of unblemished character. He had been ailing for some time and was advised that what he most needed was rest and good nursing. On the advice of friends he went to the Catholic hospital a day or two before the convention met, being assured that he would get better care there than could be had anywhere else. On the first ballot in the convention there was a tie between Judge Clark and Judge McKinley. Before the second ballot was taken it was industriously whispered through the convention that Judge Clark was in the Catholic hospital. This settled his case. When the second ballot was counted Judge Clark was snowed under. If left to the will of the people at large Judge Clark would have been their candidate.

The New Diggings.

Early in the week we made a visit to the newly discovered placer diggings in Mazourka Canyon. The scene of the discovery is in the region of the "Hickey Hood" Spring about six mile from Citrus. There are quite a number of Mexicans there who were engaged in cutting and packing wood. While looking for a spring that would be nearer his camp a Mexican named Gomez, found gold in the canon next north of the Hood Spring canyon. His find led his comrades to prospecting, and they have found gold the entire length of the canyon, a distance of over a mile. The discovery caused many others to visit the locality about 50 men being camped at the spring last Saturday night. "Colors" have been found in several of the adjacent canyons, but not not in sufficient quantities to pay. The "Mexican Gulch", as it is called, is the only place where gold has been found in paying quantities. On Saturday we saw about three hundred and fifty pounds of dirt taken from this gulch and panned, and it yielded over three dollars. The dirt was not selected but taken from the bottom of the gulch and about a foot from the surface. The formation of the range of hills through which the canyon runs is argillite, and the pay dirt is light gray in color and is formed from the slate by erosion. Underneath the argillite is limestone and underlying all is granite, which forms the summit of the main range. There has been a great deal of prospecting for quartz in the locality for over thirty years, but no paying ledge has ever been found. As the placer gold is not found in gravel, but in the crumbled slate, the supposition is reasonable that it was deposited where it now lies during some mighty eruption in past ages. The country is highly volcanic, and this seems the most reasonable conjecture as to the source from which the gold came. There are about fifteen Mexicans at work and they are all making wages, although they are operating in the most primitive manner, packing the dirt to water and washing it in gold-pans. Bob Carrasco has a good claim and he intends putting in a dry-washer. By this means the ground can be worked much more rapidly. There is also plenty of water to run several rockers and this system will probably be tried. Some further developments may be made in the near future.

A Useful Publication

A neat pamphlet has been received at this office entitled "Nevada and Her Resources." The work has been compiled under the direction of the State Bureau of Immigration. This is sufficient guarantee for the truth of all the information it contains. A brief summary is given of the history of the wonderful Comstock mine, and other mines that yielded vast treasure. But what is of far more importance, valuable information is given of the land and water resources of the State. There are millions of acres of very rich land in Nevada, and water enough runs to waste to make very much of it fertile. The climate in a great part of the State is not surpassed on the Pacific coast. If the right kind of people can be induced to settle in the rich valleys of Nevada, the State will become as prosperous as any part of the Pacific Coast. This pamphlet is thoroughly reliable. Every statement it contains is entitled to be received without question. We sincerely hope that it may attract the attention of the best class of home seekers.

On Tuesday John Nelson and Manuel Leon appeared in the Superior Court to answer to the charge of selling whisky to an Indian. The both plead guilty, waived time for sentence, and Nelson was given a year and a half at Folsom and Leon was sentenced to three years at the same place. They were taken below yesterday morning by Under-Sheriff Holland. Leon has been in trouble repeatedly and at one time served six months in the County jail.

Miss Cora Craig will arrive home this evening from Oakland where she has been attending school.

CHAPTER I.

HOW DESTINY BEGAN TO OCCUPY ITSELF WITH HER AFFAIRS.

Gen. Inigo arose, took the telegram from the table, and handed it to his friend.

One morning in the early autumn a gentleman was performing his toilet in one of the handsomest bedchambers of a certain hotel near Union square in the city of New York. He was apparently about 50 years of age, of medium height, stout, with a broad, flat head, from the top of which the hair had disappeared, leaving a bushy ring round the sides and back. His face, which was ruddy and broad, with a large nose and a thick mouth, indicated coarse good nature and shrewdness, tempered by irritability.

At the moment we come upon him he was standing in his shirt and trousers before the looking glass, endeavoring to adjust a scarf necktie of brilliant colors. Something seemed to be wrong with the fastenings, and after a few ineffectual struggles he wrathfully flung this important article of a gentleman's attire on the floor, emphasizing the act with an audible expletive. He then walked to the mantelpiece and poured some of the contents of a decanter into a tumbler, gazed at the liquor for a moment, and tossed it down his throat. He turned to the table, upon which, among various other articles, was lying a foreign cablegram. He took this up and glanced over it gloomily, then thrust his hands into his trousers pockets and strode heavily to the window, where he remained, making inarticulate grunts and mutterings, and occasionally puckering his thick lips to whistle a few bars of some operatic air.

After a while his wandering gaze was arrested by the figure of a gentleman, fashionably dressed, who was coming along the street in the direction of the hotel. He stepped hastily across the room, and pressed the button of the electric bell beside the door.

"Tell the clerk," he said to the servant who presently answered the summons, "to ask Mr. Hamilton Jocelyn if he'll come up here; I want to see him. I guess you'll find him in the office. Look alive now!"

"All right, general," replied the servant, who was a complacent negro, and seemed to entertain a kindly regard for the stout gentleman. "Nothin' else, sah?"

"Go to the devil!" the general answered testily; upon which the colored person smiled indulgently, and gently withdrew.

An interval of several minutes followed, during which the general marched up and down the room with a preoccupied and impatient air, like a lion moodily pacing his cage. At last there was a loud and brisk knock on the door, which opened at the same moment, and Mr. Jocelyn came in, with a jaunty smile and a cigar in his mouth.

"Halloo, Signor Don General Impresario Inigo!" he exclaimed, as his gaze perused the wrathful and lugubrious figure of the owner of the room; "who's been crumpling your rose leaves now? Do you know it's half-past 10 o'clock and you ought to be"——

"I ought to be! Oh, yes; of course I ought to be! I shall be, too, before long—with such a gang of thieves and scoundrels as I've got to deal with! Now, look here!"

"I'm looking," said Jocelyn, seating himself in a rocking chair and crossing one knee over the other. "Have a cigar? Why don't you put on your vest? I declare, general, you're getting stouter every day. Why don't you adopt the Turkish costume? It would suit your figure to a dot, besides giving your innocent victims a warning of your character. When I was in Stamboul"——

"Now, just you listen here," interrupted the general, a slight Jewish pronunciation becoming perceptible in his speech. He drew up a chair in front of his guest and sat down on it, with his feet drawn up underneath, and his fat hands on his knees. "Just you listen here. I'm an honest man, ain't I? I pay my way cash down, don't I? I'm no slouch nor deadbeat, am I? When I sign a contract, and find I've got left, I don't go back on it, do I? Oh, this is a sweet world for honest folk, this is! I've been in this business fifteen years, by Jupiter! I've run all the big singers in this country and in Europe, and if you Americans have ever seen an opera decently put on the stage you may thank me for it. Where would all these blessed stars and divas, with their three and four thousand dollars a night, where would they be if Moses Inigo hadn't shown 'em up, and worked for 'em, and kept 'em straight, and humored 'em, and stepped out and told lies for 'em to the public's face, by Jupiter? And here I am, a poor man today, and they rolling in riches! And haven't I just gone and built the finest opera house in the world for a million and a half of dollars out of my own pocket and"——

"Yes, for a poor and virtuous man you've done pretty well, general," put in Jocelyn, removing his hat and yawning. "But what's the matter? Has the chorus struck for higher wages? or won't the electric light work? or didn't that fellow at the club pay you the five dollars you won of him? or haven't you had your cocktail this morning? or what?"

With an air of terrible calmness Gen. Inigo arose, took the telegram from the table, and handed it to his friend without a word. The latter received it indolently, disengaged from his fob pocket a pair of eyeglasses, placed them across the handsome curve of his nose, and began to read the telegram with a sigh. Meanwhile the general, with a certain air of tragic satisfaction, repaired to the mantelpiece and repeated his late transaction with the decanter and tumbler. He then resumed his chair, still in silence.

Jocelyn had by this time reread the telegram more than once, had said "Humph!" in several tones, and had bitten his lip and pulled at his side whiskers reflectively. "Well," he observed at length, returning the paper to the other, "she has played it pretty low down on you, Inigo, and no mistake! Any idea what's got into her?"

The general lifted his shoulders and eyebrows and spread out his hands. He had temporarily become as voiceless as he was just now voluble. He was enjoying the dignity of unutterable wrongs.

"Any row about terms?" pursued Jocelyn.

The impresario smiled scornfully, as one who could not deign to correct such an insinuation.

"Must be something, you know," said Jocelyn. "A woman doesn't throw away twelve thousand dollars a week for nothing. Depend on it you've stepped on her toes somehow. I'll tell you what it may be—you haven't put about any photographs of her. Of course! What are you thinking of?"

"Yes, you are one of those fellows that think they can fix everything in five minutes," growled the impresario, breaking silence at last. "Now just you look at this." He held up a broad, square topped forefinger. "That woman has never had a photograph, nor any sort of picture, made of her in her life. She won't allow it to be done. That's her fad, and, by Jupiter, it's pretty smart of her, when you come to think of it!"

"Homely, is she? Has to depend on her voice. I see."

"You don't see an inch before your nose! She may depend on her voice when she's nothing else to depend on. There's not another voice like it ever been heard in America; but—homely! Well, I saw her last year in St. Petersburg, and if ever I set my eyes on a handsomer woman I'll take 'em out of my head and give 'em to her! No, sir! I'm a judge, it any man is, and I say that for face, figure and movement there ain't her equal on the stage today."

"Then why the deuce"——

"Exactly. That's just it. 'Why the deuce?' is the whole thing in a nutshell. Everybody says it, and what's the result? Why, that everybody's ten times as hot to see her as if they all had her picture tucked away in their breast pockets, or their watch cases, or on their mantelpieces, if they're bachelors. She makes on it every time. She knows that any woman can be made to look handsome in a photograph; but she's the only handsome woman before the public whose photo's never been seen. I tell you, sir, curiosity, if it's managed well, will make two dollars where beauty or anything else will make one. There's no advertisement ever came up to it! And to work up curiosity has been that woman's pet scheme from the start. There's more stories going about her, and scandal and fewer facts than you can put your fingers on. * * * Oh, she's smart!"

"She's overdone it this time," Jocelyn remarked. "'Unable to keep my contract' is what her telegram says; 'will pay forfeit.' How much is that, by the by?"

"Bah! I would as lief take ten cents! Am I a man to cry about a little money? That ain't my trouble. But here I am, with my opera house built, and my posters out for three weeks back, and advertisements and paragraphs in every paper in the Union, and everybody on their beam ends to get the first sight of the great Russian prima donna (though whether she's Russian, or Irish, or American, the devil only knows; it's just what she's a mind to call it), and my great prima donna drops me a telegram that she ain't coming, by Jupiter! A nice figure she makes me cut, don't she? Here I am, with a public record of fifteen years, and never once disappointed an audience, or kept them waiting, or failed to give them their money's worth, and now, after all my labor and planning and contriving, this is the reward I get—to be made a fool of! The jewel reputation, that's what she's robbed me of! I'd so soon she'd done me out of a million. But I'll be even with her, as sure as I'm Inigo, if I have to send her an ounce of dynamite in a jewel case!"

"She's never been heard in this country, has she?"

"No, nor in England either. I don't suppose there's another man besides me in New York today that has ever heard or seen her. She's kept herself on the continent and sung for royalty and kept herself out of people's way, as if she were royalty herself—that's been her game. And a first class game it is, too, when a woman can afford to play it, as she can. She never hollers for herself; she lets the others do it for her. And that's why the public will pay higher to listen to her—if they could only get her—than to any other woman that sings; and I traveled 8,000 miles and spent close on to two million dollars just so they might have what they wanted, and this is how I get left!"

"Can't you get any other"——

"Any other? Oh, yes; I dare say; of course! I think I can see 'em when I propose it! Why, they've been that jealous of this new woman, as they call her, and of me building a theatre for her, and cracking her up to be the finest soprano and the grandest singer in the world, that when they hear she's sold me they'll be ready to split 'emselves for joy; that's what they'll be! And if they could only get me to ask one of 'em to take her place, so as to give a chance to say, 'Don't you wish you may get me? I do believe they'd split outright and be done with it!"

"You're confoundedly vulgar this morning, Inigo," observed his friend musingly. "They say success is more trying than adversity, but I think the reverse is true in your case. Of course I wasn't thinking of substituting Patti or Scalchi, or any of that caliber. They'd stand on their dignity, naturally; but, as your great Russian is entirely unknown here, except by reputation, I was thinking"— He paused.

"Out with it, man, if there's anything there!" exclaimed Gen. Inigo impatiently.

"By George, I shouldn't wonder if it could be done!" muttered Jocelyn, half to himself. "Why not? There's necessity enough on both sides!"

"What's that?" demanded the general.

"I'll tell you what I want you to do, Inigo," said Jocelyn, throwing the butt of his cigar into the fireplace, and resuming his hat. "I want you to finish putting on your clothes, and get yourself into a composed and respectable frame of mind, and then join me downstairs, and we'll go over to the club and have breakfast. I've had only a cup of coffee this morning thus far."

"Have breakfast?" cried the general indignantly. "Is that all you have to propose?"

"No; not by a good deal. Unless I'm very much mistaken I've got a scheme that'll set you on your legs again, upset all the rivals and make your great Russian strangle herself for rage. But I'm going to turn it over in my mind first, and then I'll let you into it in my own way. You came to the right quarter this time, old fellow. But it isn't every man in the world, let me remind you, that's got a Hamilton Jocelyn to advise him."

"All I have to say," returned Inigo, as he took his place once more in front of the looking glass and selected another neck scarf from the drawer, "is that whoever does Moses Inigo a good turn never has any reason to regret it. That's all I have to say at present. We'll go into details when we've heard what the good turn looks like."

"You'll find me below in the reading room," said Jocelyn turning, with his hand on the door. "You'd better make your arrangements so that we can leave town if necessary and be away all night. And, mind you, don't open your mouth to any human soul about what has happened. Everything depends on that."

"I guess I know how to hold my tongue anyhow," exclaimed the impresario resentfully. But before he could say more the door had closed and he was alone. In the course of ten minutes he finished his toilet and sallied forth, jingling his door key as he went.

"If he pulls me out of this scrape, by Jupiter, I'll make his fortune," he murmured to himself, as he took the elevator to the office floor.

When the two gentlemen were seated at their breakfast table, in a retired corner of the club dining room, and had swallowed their first cup of coffee, Jocelyn opened his mouth and spake as follows:

"How old is your Russian phœnix?"

"She looks twenty and may be thirty," the general replied.

"What's her style? Stout or thin, tall or short, dark or fair?"

How the Bee Sees.

We are so used to regarding the world around us from the standpoint of our own sight that it is hard to realize that to other creatures, far outnumbering us and perhaps quite as important in the economy of nature, it must look quite different. The honey bee, for example, is supplied with a pair of compound eyes with hundreds of facets, each capable of sight by itself, and several occelli, or little, simple eyes, more closely allied to our own. How these eyes are used, what are their separate functions, what sort of images they can present to their owners, all remain questions as interesting and well nigh unsolved as they were before the days of our powerful microscopes. Notwithstanding the fact that hundreds of entomologists have been and are interested in this subject, we yet are only at the stage where we can affirm that the honey bee sees a very different flower from the one in which we observe her in search for sweets, although of what that difference is and how it is produced we can form but little idea.—Nature.

Washing the Mouth.

If people would wash out their mouths twice or three times a day with an antiseptic solution, there would not be near so much sickness. In the last 10 years I have never had a cold, sore throat or fever, and I ascribe this immunity solely to the fact that I follow this plan rigidly. There are any number of proprietary antiseptics that are excellent for this purpose, but many more simple agents that are as good or better. One of the best of the latter is carbolic acid. A very weak solution of this gargled and held in the mouth two or three times a day will work wonders. Immediately after using, one will find that the mouth feels cleaner. I believe that a great majority of the common throat and lung troubles come from the lodgment of disease microbes within the mucous membranes of the mouth. The free use of antiseptics will kill these germs.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Made Him Low Spirited.

Near to where we live in Scotland there is a farmer who has had considerable experience in wives. He has married and buried four. After the death of the last wife a friend of ours walked over one Sunday afternoon to see and condole with the poor man, who, report said, had been an exceedingly kind and indulgent husband to all his wives. He found the farmer walking listlessly about his deserted garden, and sympathy having unchained his tongue he exclaimed: "Aye, aye! What with bringing the wives hame and pittem them awa I am sair hadden doon" (low spirited).—London Gentlewoman.

An Accommodating Guest.

A married couple, being invited to a friend's house to dinner, commence quarreling with each other as soon as they are seated at the table.

Their host ventures to remark that such conduct is somewhat unseemly, whereupon the husband retorts, "When you invited us, you said that you hoped we would feel quite at home, and we certainly do not intend to disappoint you."—Paris Figaro.

"The Cottager's Hearthstone."

I once painted a picture of an interior; I called it "The Cottager's Hearthstone." I spent nearly nine months upon that hearthstone. One day, after I had given the thing the finishing touches, I showed it to a friend.

"What do you call it?" he asked.

I told him "The Cottager's Hearthstone."

"Oh!"

He looked dubious. I have often seen people look that way when they have been looking at pictures of mine.

"Where's the hearthstone?"

I could have shown him where it was if I had had heart enough to do it. When a man has made a hearthstone the feature of his picture, and has spent nine months on it in order to make it as unmistakable as possible, to be asked to point out the part of the picture in which it is supposed to be, is a discouraging request, from the point of view of the earnest struggler in the toils of art.—All the Year Round.

Love versus Pounds Sterling.

Breach of promise actions still go merrily on in spite of theorists who would abolish this remedy for woman's wounded feelings. In a recent one the defendant was a Huddersfield hotel keeper. He had addressed his victim in loving terms, had ornamented his epistles with "cabalistic signs commonly in use among lovers" and had presented her with an engagement ring. Yet he changed his mind, and when asked why, had no better reason to give than that he was "occasionally troubled with indigestion." Miss Squires, the ill used lady, sarcastically assured the jury that she had never heard anything about indigestion until her lover found that she was not able to raise a sum of money to help him in business. Miss Squires got a verdict for fifty pounds.—London News.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO HIMSELF.

The most inhuman outrages, outrages which would disgrace the savage, man perpetrates upon his own system by swallowing drastic purgatives which convulse his stomach, agonize his intestines and weaken his system. Many people constantly do this under the impression that medicaments only which are violent in their action, and particularly cathartics, are of any avail. Irreparable injury to health is wrought under this mistaken idea. The laxative which most nearly approaches the beneficient action of nature is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which is painless but thorough, and invigorates the intestinal canal instead of weakening and irritating it. The liver and the stomach share in the benign discipline instituted by this comprehensive medicine, whose healthful influence is felt throughout the system. Malarious, rheumatic, kidney and nervous complaints succumb to it.

The best physicians in Cincinnati, failed to help me. My limbs and body were swollen to enormous size, and I was suffering terrible agony. The doctors all said I could not get well again, that I was liable to drop dead at any moment. My wife sent for the priest, to prepare me for death. While waiting for death I remembered reading of your 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and thought I would try it as a last hope. When I had taken three bottles I was almost well. The swelling entirely disappeared and I was soon able to resume work. My health is better now than it has been for twenty-five years."

THE PHŒBE BIRD.

The scarlet poppies in my garden growing
Are drowsy with the heat;
The blue is cloudless and no breeze is blowing;
Only one sound so sweet.
So plaintive on my languid ear is falling
The soft insistence of a wee bird calling
Phœbe! Phœbe!

Nay, birdling, what has Phœbe done to grieve thee?
Or where has Phœbe flown?
Could fancy lure or passion bid her leave thee?
Surely thy tender tone,
The fond reiteration of thy pleading,
Would win her home, Love's gentle summons heeding,
Phœbe! Phœbe!

Sweet minor strain amid the summer gladness,
How can I choose but hear?
And yet my heart is breaking with the sadness;
My Phœbe is so dear,
So dear to me that all my soul is sighing,
And like the lonely bird is ever crying
Phœbe! Phœbe!

—M. E. Bannister in New York Sun.

THREE UMBRELLAS

"If it didn't look as if I were trying to gain some benefit from your umbrella," he remarked as he chanced to meet her on the church steps after service. "I would ask to walk home with you. I didn't expect rain when I left home, so I am unprepared."

"However," came her clear reply, just arch enough to be fascinating and just tender enough to be frank, "if you'll carry my umbrella and let me turn my energies to keeping my dress caught up out of the mud I'll be very thankful to you."

They had walked, strangely enough, half way home in almost complete silence, when a man and a woman passed them, like them, under one umbrella; but, unlike them, the woman was held snugly close to the man's side as she clung to his arm. It was a picture of that freedom which so undeniably marks a congenial man and wife, whose companionship has ripened into frank trust.

As they passed Robert Courtright said, half thoughtfully perhaps:

"They are sensible. If two are caught use one umbrella [illegible] commended if they strive to take little room as possible. Even if it won't you take my arm?"

"But they are plainly not strangers as we," she retur[illegible] that both were treading [illegible] ground.

And some of our de[illegible] memories are the cruelest part of our [illegible] When finally she stood before a m[illegible] and realized that that changed cre[illegible] was herself, a mighty resolve filled h[illegible] she would go to the source of that mem[illegible]

She knew where he was; she knew th[illegible] he had married three years after that bitter morning in the rain, and had married a wealthy wife. That was the reason that she had thrust him back from her long ago, just because of his poverty. Not that it would pain her; a thousand times no! Hadn't she cried out night after night since that starvation with him would be only bliss? But she had known his ambitions and his capabilities, knew his dreams of success, and she realized his ability to turn the dreams to realities. She was poor. Would she permit herself to hang a millstone about his neck? Would she hold him always in the depths of poverty by being his wife and the mother of his needy children? No, she would hurt his heart before she would ruin his life.

Time had proved that she had been right. His wife was a beautiful woman, and her wealth had opened boundless opportunities to him. He had risen—she had known that he would. But now that she scarcely was able to know herself, she would venture into his world and see for herself how happy and proud and prosperous he was.

So having spent all but her last bill for her ticket, she stepped into Philadelphia one spring evening, steeling her heart to what might follow. The next evening she had walked past his great, rich house and was starting back when a sudden shower burst unexpectedly upon her.

She gathered up her skirts in that particular way so characteristic of a dainty woman, and was hurrying along when all at once she was conscious of a sharp, childish cry at her side. Turning, she beheld a tall, sad faced man trying to quiet a fretful baby of about three years, which held out its dimpled hands to her and cried:

"Mamma! Mamma!"

The gentleman strove to stop it, and Gabriel started on. But sharp and piercing came the "Mamma!" and her heart bade her linger.

For the first time the man spoke to her.

"I must beg your pardon, madam. His mother has just died, and something about you seems to have recalled her to him.

Gabriel's heart softened at once. Going straight up she took the tiny, outstretched hands in her own and murmured, "Poor motherless little one."

The father held out his umbrella over her, and for the first time she looked at him—the face was Robert's! She was glad for the excuse of turning to baby again and murmuring something unintelligible.

However, he had not recognized her, so she drew all her strength to her assistance and succeeded in hiding her emotion.

"If you will walk under my umbrella, as I am going your way for this square, you can keep dry. And, too, I fear baby won't like to part with you now."

There was no easy way to retreat; it would have been absurd to scud off in a changed direction through the pelting rain, so she continued talking hurriedly to the child. As they reached the foot of the broad stone steps she stopped. "I cannot thank you enough for having calmed Leslie.

"His nurse left this morning, and he will not be consoled by any of the other servants. So I finally told Mrs. Clarke, the housekeeper, that I would try him for a walk. But will you not take the umbrella? It will be a shame to expose yourself to such a deluge."

She gracefully declined all thanks and such kind offers, and glided quickly off, a tall, black robed figure daring the watery drops. But a perfect shriek from baby arose when he found himself deserted in in this fashion, and each succeeding cry became louder and more distressing. Again Gabriel could not go. Again she came back to him.

"Will you please come into the house with him? Mrs. Clarke may there be better able to get him away than I."

So Gabriel, carrying the child, entered his house unknown, but welcome even then.

Leslie was not to be easily deceived, and all the ruses were seen through immediately by his careful, big blue eyes.

"We must get a nurse this very night," declared Mrs. Clarke as she endeavored in her practical, cold hearted way to inveigle the young lord from his new "mamma."

"But," groaned Mr. Courtright, "where can one get one which he can trust on such short notice?"

A bold idea entered Gabriel's head. She tried three or four times to speak, and her voice failed. Finally she choked back the lump in her throat and said:

"Would it be presumptuous for me to offer myself? I can show you excellent references, and I am now looking for some such position."

"You a nursemaid?" exclaimed Mr. Courtright in amazement. Then, a moment later, he would have given much to have it back unsaid; her plain black gown was darned at the elbows—it was merely her way of wearing it that gave her the appearance of a woman of long found[illegible] culture and delicacy.

[illegible] years went by, in which Miss Var[illegible] she was now known, undiscovered, [illegible] loved by and loved in return Mr. [illegible]right's two children. It was one [illegible]g in March, just before dusk, when [illegible] had left Leslie up stairs asleep and [illegible] come down to the drawing room [illegible] to stay with the child till her [illegible] came home [illegible] was late and Mabel [illegible] wandered off [illegible] parlor, thus leaving Gabriel alone [illegible] lighted room when Mr. Cour[illegible] entered.

[illegible] as I said, I often al[illegible] you are she when I stop to [illegible] toward you."

"Miss Varney," he broke in.

"Let me finish," she continued. "Take [illegible] brella and go down to the east gate. [illegible] ask a question, but take the umbrella and wait there."

Then she sped up stairs. He was dazed; maybe that was the reason that he, as in a dream, did as she had bid and took his station down by the rustic gate, where the soft falling rain dripped through the leaves on to the gravel of the walk.

Suddenly he was conscious of a rustle at his side, and turning, there stood a tall girl, with a loving smile beaming above the same dark collar, with a sweet face shining from beneath the same velvet bonnet remembered so well from long ago, and an old time voice murmured, "Robert."

"Gabriel?" he gasped.

"Yes," she laughed, "Gabriel and your nursemaid in one."

When they walked up to the house that night she clung lovingly to his arm under the narrow umbrella, for they were strangers no longer.—Chicago News.

How It Worked.

A well known borrower, whose credit had daily grown nearer the ground and worn out in forty places, met an acquaintance the other day on the steps of the city hall.

"I say, Tom," he said, "lend me five dollars for a minute or two. I'll give it right back to you."

After some hesitation the money was handed over and handed back promptly. Then the same performance was gone through with on one dollar, two, ten and twenty.

"That's all, thank you," said the borrower, starting off.

"Hold on!" exclaimed the lender. "Tell me what you mean by that monkey business?"

"Oh, nothing much," was the reply; "only it's been so long since I have been able to borrow anything under any circumstances that I was afraid I had lost my grip entirely. Thank heaven I have some little credit left. Will you lend me a quarter until tomorrow?"

His scheme was a success.—Detroit Free Press.

The Puritan Way.

The old Puritan way of dealing with delinquents is pretty nearly effaced in New England, where sinners have their way much as in other parts of the country. But a curious outcropping of the old summary manner was observed in Hingham the other day. The oldest church in Hingham is known as The Old Ship. It is very smart looking for its years, and has a curious spire and weather vane, and on the ceiling beneath a mariner's compass painted with great exactness, the Old Ship is the center of interest to visitors, who wander about its well kept grounds and meditate in the old colonial graveyard, for except on Sunday the church is closed.

But on the doors are nailed two long written statements. These are naturally taken by visitors for descriptive history of the building, and the eager visitors run to their perusal. On the contrary they find posted the names, with full descriptions, of delinquent pewholders and their arrearages.—New York Evening Sun.

LIFE ON THE NILE.

A Charming Way to See a Portion of Egypt if One Only Has the Time.

BUSY BANKS AND LIVELY BOATS.

A Nile Dahabeah is a Delightful Kind of Boat to Spend a Few Months on the Famous River.

Given a good boat and crew and pleasant companions I know nothing more enjoyable in the way of travel than life for some months on board a dahabeah on the Nile. The Nile is seldom rough enough to cause discomfort even to the most timid, and at the worst the dahabeah can be moored against the bank while the storm lasts. Another great advantage of sailing on the Nile is the steadiness of the wind. From the beginning of winter to the end of spring—that is, while the Nile is navigable—the north wind blows steadily up stream with sufficient force to drive sailing boats against the current at a fair pace, while on the other hand the current is strong enough to carry a boat without sails down against the wind except when it blows a gale.

A pleasure dahabeah under full sail is a beautiful sight. It has one great sail, of lattea pattern, attached to a yard of enormous length. Small sails are added as occasion may require. Over the cabins and saloon is a railed high poop, with easy chairs and lounges and gay with plants and flowers. To the east stretches the Arabian, to the west the Lybian desert, each flanked by a range of bare hills, which in a few places touch the river, but lie for the most part two or three miles back on either side. Ages before the pyramids the Nile filled the whole of the valley to the depth of some 200 feet, and the yellow hills, now so bare, were clothed with a luxuriant vegetation, of which the evidence still remains in petrified forests and fossilized plants. It was plainly a period of heavy rainfall and impetuous torrents, carving out vast gorges and pouring their waters into the Nile.

The Nile is a busy river, full of life and movement, dahabeahs, bent on pleasure or on trade, passing up and down its streams with scarcely any intermission, while its banks are full of interest to the lover of the picturesque; crowds of women, with graceful forms and not seldom very comely faces, filling heavy earthen jars with water and carrying them home on their heads; men, with skins of bronze, toiling in relays of three hours each at the shadufs under a burning sun, and singing the while to relieve the monotony of their daily labor; boatmen floating with the stream or sailing against it, and they also singing a weird, wailing chant, like the echo of a hopeless cry wafted across the centuries from hard bondage under Egyptian taskmasters, such as the Israelites endured before the exodus; flocks of pelicans standing on the sand or maneuvering in the air like soldiers on the march; kingfishers, now hovering over the water, now darting beneath its surface in quest of a passing fish.

And then there is the mysterious Nile itself, mysterious still, though its sources have been disclosed and its long meanderings tracked from the uplands of central Africa to the margin of the midland sea. The voyager now, it is true, seldom sees a crocodile unless he goes beyond the second cataract; still less has he a chance of witnessing any of those fierce encounters between crocodiles and hippopotami which are sculptured on the walls of the temple of Edfu. In those ancient days, when the shores of the Nile down to Cairo were lined with reeds and papyrus, the river abounded with crocodiles and hippopotami, both of which afforded excellent—albeit sometimes perilous—sport to the dwellers on the banks. Firearms and steamers have now driven those fierce monsters of the deep beyond the second cataract.

But, apart from its inhabitants, the Nile itself has a mystic interest of its own. I do not wonder that in the mythology of ancient Egypt it was endowed with life and received some sort of divine honors. Its periodical inundations, while their causes were unknown, placed it outside the category of ordinary rivers and invested it with an atmosphere of mystery. And in the youth of our race, when woods and glades and rivers were believed to own appropriate denizens, it is easy to understand how the Nile came to be regarded as endowed with more than natural life. It is so full of subcurrents and eddies that the amphibious natives, who swim like fish, will not venture to cross it except astride on logs of wood. In the stillness of the night these eddies gurgle and murmur past your dahabeah like spirits from "the vasty deep" engaged in confidential talk.

And who can adequately describe those splendid dawns and gorgeous sunsets which are among the commonplaces of Nile scenery? I have often seen the whole sky from the zenith to the horizon become one molten, mantling sea of color and fire, every ripple and wave transfused into unsullied, shadowless crimson and purple and scarlet and opalescent hues, shading off into colors for which our language supplies no words and previous experience no ideas. This splendor of indescribable intermingling colors appears at sunset on the western horizon and is followed by a soft sheen, as of moonlight, reflected on the hills on the eastern bank of the river.

In short, life on a dahabeah is one perpetual picnic. You stop where you please and either enjoy the dolce far niente of remaining on board or making excursions to old temples or tombs, or taking part in a veritable picnic in the desert, and a picnic in the desert under favorable auspices is not likely to be forgotten.—London Spectator.

Odd Records.

Records are kept with knotted cords in Polynesia. During the early part of this century and previously, the official taxgatherers on the island of Hawaii, in the Sandwich group, did all their accounts on a rope 2,400 feet long, which was divided into lengths, each corresponding to a district. Loops, knots and feathers tied along the rope served as memoranda for the hogs, pigs and pieces of sandalwood collected from taxpayers.—Yankee Blade.

Some very ancient books are to be found in the sacred relics of Ceylon. They are formed of palm leaves written upon with a metal pen and are bound merely by a silken string.

During the past eight years the organized labor of Boston has reduced the working hours in that city about 26,520,000, and the wages were increased about $500,000 annually.

One Game He Hadn't Played.

The Main house, in Columbia, was the scene of a jolly crowd of the knights of the grip a few days ago. They were whiling away a rainy day telling jokes, performing tricks with cards, and playing practical jokes upon each other. There was one man in the company, a new drummer, rather young and unsophisticated, but, oh, how smart he thought himself. He knew everything better than all the rest. He spoiled every trick by telling how it was done and ruined every joke by calling out the point in advance of the speaker. The boys tried to squelch him, but it could not be done.

"You seem to know almost everything," said an old clothing drummer sarcastically.

"Yes," replied the young man, "there are few tricks or jokes that I don't know. You can't catch this chicken."

The fiendish smile lit up the features of the clothing man as a plot flashed through his head. "Did you ever play the game of gossip?" he asked after awhile.

"No," replied the other, "at least I never played it under that name."

The clothing man grouped the boys in a semicircle, taking care to place the proprietor of the hotel at the very end and next to him he stationed the smart young fellow. Then he gave his instructions. Each was to repeat as exactly as possible the sentence he heard into the ear of the man next to him. The one who made a mistake was to pay a forfeit. It was very simple.

"I would like a bottle of champagne and seven glasses," was the sentence which the clothing man whispered into the ear of his neighbor. Each in turn whispered it to the next man, until the smart boy whispered it to the hotel proprietor. "I would like a bottle of champagne and seven glasses."

"Certainly," replied the proprietor, as he arose with alacrity to fill the order. A bottle was brought in and the unsophisticated young man had to pay for it, for it was his order. The bottle was emptied with great gusto by the assembled drummers, and for the time being at least the young man hadn't another word to say.—Philadelphia Times.

Speaking His Piece.

Major Campion shot a deer and dashed off in pursuit. At that moment a well mounted Indian, a Ute, appeared in sight, the first one that Major Campion had seen.

The deer and the dog disappeared in the thicket. Just then the major crossed a rough hollow, and when he came again in sight of the thicket he found the Indian's horse tied to a tree. The major fastened his own horse near the Indian's and pushed into the brush.

There he found Nip, his dog, astride the dead body of the deer, while the Indian stood a little way off, bow and arrow in hand, violently remonstrating with the dog, speaking in the Ute tongue with a mixture of English words.

Major Campion ordered Nip to down charge and then held up his open right hand with the palm toward the Ute—the recognized sign of peace. The Indian relaxed his bow, laid it down and advanced to shake hands, all the while with a sharp eye on the dog.

By means of signs he made the white man understand that he had wounded the deer, and was in pursuit of it when the dog pulled it down. Then he drew his knife, skinned and cut up the deer in a workmanlike manner, tied the fore half of it up in the skin and placed it on one side. The other half he laid at Major Campion's feet, at the same time pointing to Nip and delivering himself of a speech in the Ute language.

The white man understood his meaning, but not a word of his address. The Indian and the dog had killed the deer together, and the dog's owner was entitled to half the game. The speech called for a reply, and the major was equal to the emergency. He arose and delivered in full the classical declamation, "My name is Norval," with appropriate gestures, just as he had many times given it at school.

Nothing could have been better. As he says, it was a great success. The Indian was moved. He and the white man shook hands with effusion, and each with his share of the venison rode away.—Youth's Companion.

Property in Chicago.

Sixty years ago the lot where the Chicago opera house now stands, at Clark and Washington streets, one of the most central in the city, was sold for the sum of sixty-one dollars lawful money—wildcat currency being regarded lawful in those days if you could get anybody to accept it. Yes, sir; that lot, which will soon be worth a million, was sold by the commissioners of Cook county to John Noble for less than an extra good suit of clothes would cost now. The Noble family still have the original deed in their possession.

It is well not to forget such evidences of our progress, prospects and opportunities. Many boys, and even young men, are now living in Chicago who will be living here sixty years hence, and who will see more remarkable and surprising changes and greater increases in property values than the opera house lot shows. This lot is now worth $7,000 or $8,000 a front foot, or probably $600,000 or $700,000. Chicago is destined to have 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 people—it will be the London, while New York will be the Liverpool of America. There are millions yet to come and millions of money yet to be made in Chicago real estate.—Interview in Chicago Mail.

Diamond Fields of India.

Diamond fields in India were known from the very earliest times. In the sacred books of India eight localities are mentioned as yielding diamonds, and of these three have been identified with the three great diamond fields known at the present day—Matanga (Kistna and Godavery), Paunda (Chota Nagpur) and Vena Gunga (Wairaghar). The diamondiferous area of India, so far as is known, is perhaps more extensive than that of the rest of the world, and nine-tenths of the famous jewels are Indian stones.—Mining and Engineering.

A Great Work of Art.

It was Apelles who visited the studio of Protogenes in Rome, and finding the artist absent drew a thin colored line in such a way that the Roman knew that only his Grecian brother could have done it. But, not to be outdone, Protogenes drew a thinner line upon that of Apelles, and when this was seen Apelles drew a third line upon that of Protogenes. This panel was then looked upon as the greatest work of art, so says the story, in the palace of the Cæsars.—Harper's Young People.

Where the Money Belonged.

At Colmar a lawyer bequeathed the sum of 100,000 francs to the madhouse in that locality. "I earned this money," said he in his will, "from those who spend their lifetime in lawsuits. This legacy is only a restitution."—San Francisco Argonaut.

HOSPITAL NURSES

What a Woman Who Desires to Become a Professional Should Do.

DIFFERENT METHODS OF TRAINING.

Application to the Superintendent the First Step—Advantages for Bright Women.

Many comprehensive and exhaustive articles have been written on the life and work of trained hospital nurses, but as yet little has been said concerning their preliminary instruction, either practical or theoretical, and still this is not the least interesting phase of the nurse's career. Not so many years ago convalescing patients were of some service in their stronger moments, and some of these, having acquired a thoroughness of care and a practical efficiency, were employed as regular nurses.

Oftentimes there was an extreme scarcity in the number of nurses, and it is related that a tour of the "employment" offices of the city has been made, and the more respectable of the applicants for positions selected as assistants to the nurses. In time, when experience and intuitive knowledge of the art of caring for the sick had perfected their practical training, they were graduated into the ranks of nurses, and some of the more adept became head nurses and superintendents of nurses.

But this was an octave or more of years ago. This was during a regime when the supply was not nearly equal to the demand and when samaritanism did not walk hand in hand with intelligence and culture. The training school for nurses, however, has at once and for all time put an end to the practical training only, and now the trained nurse is a mistress of theory, both surgical and medical. This is especially true of the City hospital. The training school at this institution is the largest in the country, and its popularity and recognized worth are attested by the 700 applicants for the forty vacant places of one year.

Until recently there were two methods of managing the nurses' training schools. There were corporative organizations, some of which were independent of, but the greater number attached to, some hospital having wards for the sick, and there were training schools combined under one management, generally the trustees or managing board of the hospital.

The Boston City Hospital Training school is controlled by the trustees of the hospital, like all other departments of the hospital service. The superintendent of the hospital has the general supervision of all matters relating to the school, its course of work and study, lectures and discipline.

The superintendent of nurses has the immediate charge of all the nursing in the hospital, of all nurses employed in the wards and also the instruction and management of the nurses in the training school. All female nurses in the hospital must be connected with the school. This should for all time silence those who speak of the inability or want of care of the hospital nurses. At the present day there is no one, not even the regular physician, more alive to the emergencies and dangers of a situation than a professional or trained nurse. As a well known physician has said, "Professional nursing implies intelligence."

It will no doubt interest the public to know who these nurses are, where they come from and what constitutes their method of training. In the first place the applicants are natives of every civilized country. The rich often apply in person, but the preliminary correspondence is usually carried on by letter. According to the prospectus of the school the most desirable age for candidates is from twenty-three to thirty-five years. They must be of sound health, and should send with their application a certificate from a physician certifying to the fact. They should also send a brief personal history, and give the names and addresses of three responsible persons, not of their own kin, who know of their good character and capabilities.

Then a letter is sent to the applicant, in which she is requested to write a personal letter stating age, height, weight, health, strength, educational advantages, family ties, and her reasons and motives for desiring the education of a nurse in order to ascertain if she is eligible to become a candidate. Careful and a more or less exhaustive scrutiny is made as to the antecedents, character, education and general fitness of each candidate, requiring in some cases many weeks before the candidate is accepted or rejected.

After this, upon the recommendation of the superintendent and the approval of the trustees, they will be received for two months on probation. The fitness of candidates for the training and work, and the propriety of retaining or dismissing them, will be determined by the authorities in charge of the school under the direction of the trustees.

At the end of the first month candidates, if considered satisfactory, are permitted to wear the cap and enter upon the regular course of training; but such candidates are not permitted to join the school formally until the end of the second month, when if accepted they sign an agreement to complete the prescribed course of two years and to conform to all rules.

At the end of the first six months the record and work of each pupil are carefully scrutinized as to her fitness to make a good nurse, and the right is reserved by the authorities of the hospital to terminate then or any time the connection of any pupil or nurse with the school for inefficiency, misconduct, generally unsatisfactory record or for any other reason which may be deemed sufficient.

During the first two months the pupils are called "probationers," for the remainder of the first year junior nurses, and during the second year senior nurses. Nurses who remain in the hospital after graduation become head nurses.

The nurses of all grades reside in the two nurses' homes connected with the hospital. These houses afford the most homelike environments, and have accommodations for eighty-eight nurses.—Chicago Tribune.

Japanese T[illegible]s.

In Japan, in the Fourt[illegible] century, the nobles vied with each other in the splendor of their tea entertainments. On the floors were spread magnificent tiger and leopard skins and troops of beautiful dancing girls added to the brilliancy of the scene. The simple meal taken at the beginning of the ceremony became a sumptuous dinner for which some new delicacy was constantly sought. The chair room expanded into a magnificent apartment hung with gold and silver brocades, and around the walls were suspended magnificent swords and rich and exquisite ornaments. An English writer tells us that at these parties the host would often endeavor to obtain as great a variety of brands of tea as possible. Then each guest in turn tried to guess the different brands. Every correct guess entitled its maker to one of the treasures with which the room was filled, and an unwritten but never broken law required him to present it to one of the geisha or dancing girls.

Yoshimasa Shogun, during the latter half of the Fifteenth century, abdicated in order to give himself up to these entertainments, and was joined by Shuko and Shinno, two famous Buddhist abbots, who, it is to be feared, loved pleasure better than vigils and feasts. The Shogun and the men of religion drew up a set of rules, many of which are still in vogue. They prescribed that the size of the room should be nine feet square, and Shinno invented the curious little spoon of bent bamboo, slightly broadened at the bowl, which is still used, though it is quite fashionable for a devotee to design his own spoon. The greatest mark of esteem a man of superior rank could bestow upon an inferior whom he wished to honor was to present him with some piece of a tea service. Such great men as Nobunaga and Hideyodin, two of the most famous generals Japan ever produced, were tea enthusiasts.—San Francisco Call.

The Girl Saved the Goods.

A few miles from Lochnaw is the little village of Dally Bay. Here some smugglers had landed a cargo of their usual wares, and these were carried up the hill of South Cairn, waiting till a band of volunteers arrived with a string of pack horses to transport them inland for distribution.

The custom house officer in charge of the district received information of their doings, and hurrying to the spot with the only guardsman disengaged he promptly effected a seizure of the whole of the goods. The smugglers sulked off and the one guardsman was sent back to press men and horses in the king's name to convey the precious treasure to Stranraer.

The officer, pluming himself not a little on his alacrity, sauntered sentry fashion round and round his prize, which lay heaped before him in rich profusion, his sword and a brace of formidable pistols at his side.

Presently Maggie McConnell approached the great man, wishing him a good morning, to which he affably replied, and accepted Maggie's proffered hand. His arm was thrust upward and at the same time he was encircled by the siren's arms, and with a heavy fall was thrown helplessly on his back.

Maggie then sat coolly down upon her victim, and having placed her apron over his eyes she held him firmly down, as if held in a vise.

At last, but only when it suited her pleasure, Maggie released him from her grasp. But when he looked up not one of the articles lay in its place, as he had himself seen them just before on the ground.

By and by his companion reappeared, but only to find the head officer tete-a-tete with this Galloway matron, who, bidding them adieu, disappeared without further loss of time, wishing both a pleasant ride into Stranraer.—Boston Herald.

Queens in the Kitchen.

Under Louis XIV nothing was thought of, as you may imagine, except good living. The grand roi had personally no social talent whatever, but on the other hand ladies of the highest lineage did not hesitate to put a finger into the social pastry. It was a time when Mme. de Maintenon, to satisfy a caprice of her royal lover, invented "cotelettes en papillotes," and when the Princess de Conti imagined the "carre de mouton," which has remained her greatest title to glory. In her retreat of Les Rocheres Mme. de Sevigne's aristocratic fingers grilled waffles of excellent taste and of which she was almost as proud as of her letters, which, however, were evidently written to regale the court and the city.

Queens themselves have passed an apprenticeship in the kitchen. Moreover, did not Francois I, of gallant memory, get the fashion by furnishing the receipt for savory fritters which, naturally, everybody found perfect? The haughty Marie Antoinette interested herself in the details of the cuisine, and if she did not, like the Duchess of Burgundy, make her own butter, she at least supervised its preparation. It is known that when at the Tittle Trianon she made brioches which rivaled the famous ones of Nanterre.

In reality, however, these occupations were agreeable pastimes rather than royal duties. Such was the work of Louis XVI, when making locks, or of Louis XV, as he passed from the cultivation of strawberries or lettuce to needlework or embroidery.—Paris Intermediaire.

A Human Analysis.

Dr. Lancaster, the famous London physician and surgeon who analyzed the body of a man in the year 1875, gives the following result of his unique experiment: The body operated upon weighed 158 pounds exactly. From this mass of flesh, bones, muscles, etc., he obtained 23.1 pounds of carbon, 2.2 pounds lime, 22.3 ounces of phosphorus, and 1 ounce each of sodium (salt), iron, potassium, magnesium and silicon. Besides the above "solids" he obtained from the same subject 5,595 cubic feet of oxygen and 105,900 cubic feet of hydrogen, this latter weighing 15 pounds 4 ounces, and 52 cubic feet of nitrogen. All of these elements combined into the following: One hundred and twenty-one pounds of water, 16 pounds of gelatine, 1⅛ pounds fat, 8 pounds of fibrin and albumen, 7 pounds of phosphate of lime and 2⅜ pounds of other mineral substances.—St. Louis Republic.

KILLING AN ELK.

An Exhilarating Adventure With One at Two Ocean Pass.

CREEPING UPON A DOZEN HERD.

An Interesting Description of a Hunting Trip—Out for Big Game—Chasing a Wounded Bull.

From an interesting article on "An Elk Hunt at Two Ocean Pass," by the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, in The Century, the following quotation is made:

Next morning dawned clear and cold, the sky a glorious blue. Woody and I started to hunt over the great tableland and led our stout horses up the mountain side by elk trails so bad that they had to climb like goats. All these elk trails have one striking peculiarity—they lead through thick timber, but every now and then send off short, well worn branches to some cliff edge or jutting crag commanding a view far and wide over the country beneath. Elk love to stand on these lookout points and scan the valleys and mountains round about.

Blue grouse rose from beside our path, Clarke's crows flew past us, with a hollow, flapping sound, or lighted in the pine tops, calling and flirting their tails; the gray clad whisky jacks, with multitudinous cries, hopped and fluttered near us. Snowshoe rabbits scuttled away, the great furry feet which give them their name already turning white. At last we came out on the great plateau, seamed with deep, narrow ravines. Reaches of pasture alternated with groves and open forests of varying size. Almost immediately we heard the bugle of a bull elk and saw a big band of cows and calves on the other side of a valley. There were three bulls with them, one very large, and we tried to creep up on them, but the wind was baffling and spoiled our stalk, so we returned to our horses, mounted them and rode a mile farther, toward a large open wood on a hillside.

When within 200 yards we heard directly ahead the bugle of a bull and pulled up short. In a moment I saw him walking through an open glade; he had not seen us. The slight breeze brought us his scent. Elk have a strong characteristic smell; it is usually sweet like that of a herd of Alderney cows, but in old bulls while rutting it is rank, pungent and lasting. We stood motionless till the bull was out of sight, then stole to the wood, tied our horses and trotted after him. He was traveling fast, occasionally calling, whereupon others in the neighborhood would answer. Evidently he had been driven out of some herd by the master bull.

He went faster than we did, and while we were vainly trying to overtake him we heard another very loud and sonorous challenge to our left. It came from a ridge crest at the edge of the woods, among some scattered clumps of the northern nut pine, or pinon, a queer conifer growing very high on the mountains, its multiforked trunk and wide spreading branches giving it the rounded top and at a distance the general look of an oak rather than a pine. We at once walked toward the ridge—up wind. In a minute or two, to our chagrin, we stumbled on an outlying spike bull, evidently kept on the outskirts of the herd by the master bull. I thought it would alarm all the rest, but as we stood motionless it could not see clearly what we were. It stood, ran, stood again, gazed at us and trotted slowly off.

We hurried forward as fast as we dared, and with too little care, for we suddenly came in view of two cows. As they raised their heads to look, Woody squatted down where he was, to keep their attention fixed, while I cautiously tried to slip off to one side unobserved. Favored by the neutral tint of my buckskin hunting shirt, with which my shoes, leggings and soft hat matched, I succeeded. As soon as I was out of sight I ran hard and came up to a hillock crested with pinons, behind which I judged I should find the herd. As I approached the crest, their strong, sweet smell smote my nostrils. In another moment I saw the tips of a pair of mighty antlers, and I peered over the crest with my rifle at the ready. Thirty yards off, behind a clump of pinons, stood a huge bull, his head thrown back as he rubbed his shoulders with his horns. There were several cows around him, and one saw me immediately and took alarm.

I fired into the bull's shoulder, inflicting a mortal wound; but he went off, and I raced after him at top speed, firing into his flank; then he stopped, very sick, and I broke his neck with a fourth bullet. An elk often hesitates in the first moments of surprise and fright, and does not get really under way for 200 or 300 yards; but when once fairly started he may go several miles, even though mortally wounded; therefore the hunter, after his first shot, should run forward as fast as he can, and shoot again and again until the quarry drops. In this way many animals that would otherwise be lost are obtained, especially by the man who has a repeating rifle. Nevertheless the hunter should beware of being led astray by the ease with which he can fire half a dozen shots from his repeater, and he should aim as carefully with each shot as if it were his last. No possible rapidity of fire can atone for habitual carelessness of aim with the first shot.

"How disappointed I am!" said the friend. "I hoped you were going to stay a week or two."—Tit-Bits.

The civil wars in San Salvador and the other South American States must soon cease for want of material for slaughter. At the rate they are killing each other down there it cannot go long before the whole country will be depopulated.

Brother De Young of the "live paper" shows every disposition to make the path of Perkins to the United States Senate a thorny one. It is something strange that so much bitterness should grow out of sugar. The well meant efforts of the accomplished journalist are probably thrown away, as a Democrat will in all liklihood knock down the persimmon.

The San Jose woolen mills, which have been closed down for the past six months, resumed operations last week with half a force. When the tariff bill which places wool on the free list, becomes a law, every woolen mill in the country will go to work. Shoddy will be discarded and the short wool of the Pacific coast will be used with the long wool of Australia, and our sheep owners will be prosperous again.

The United States Government refuses to surrender the Salvador refugees on board the warship Benington. When the men took refuge there was no government in Salvador, and the United States now refuses to respond to a demand by the revolutionists. This is the right course to pursue. It is precisely what we expected and will teach these quarreling Central American States a lesson they need—namely, that established Governments will not recognize any and every faction that manages to get temporary control of State administration in Central America.

In the convention at Sacramento the populists indicated of their nominations, at least, ... to have been governed ... by the fitness of their candidates for the very important office of Attorney General they selected a man who gives his whole time and ... to the study and practice of law. Whether as a practicing attorney or as an officer, he is fully convinced that the only sure way to success is by diligent study of law; and to this no lawyer can give more diligent attention than does Louis Luckel of Los Angeles, the Populist nominee for Attorney General.

Elward Atkinson and other opponents of bimetallism have endeavored to break the force of the argument that the fall in prices is due to the demonetization of silver by asserting that the wages of workmen have not fallen. The contention at no time was absolutely sound, but now it is rapidly being negatived by an abundance of evidence which goes to show that wages in this country and all over the world will soon be in harmony with the low range of prices caused by the appreciation of gold which has followed the abandonment of silver as a money metal by the civilized nations of the world.

Rev. Dr. Parkhurst of New York in a recent public address is reported to have said that "there is not a great deal of statesmanship in the pulpit today and none whatever outside of it." If we are to look to the pulpit for remedies for the wrongs from which people are now suffering, the sooner we elect none but clergymen to the legislature the better. But we had church-and-state government once upon a time and were very glad to escape from it, so there is not much danger of its being tried again in the near future. The statesmanship of the age in which we live does not contemplate religious distinctions of any sort. The chief aim in government is to elect men to office who will stand the test of Mr. Jefferson: "Is he honest? Is he capable?"

Mrs. W. M. Richards and son of Keeler departed on Tuesday's train for the midwinter Fair and to visit relatives in Nevada City and Red Bluff.

The mining outlook in the Darwin section and in fact through all of southern Inyo is apparently looking better than it has for some time past. Several transfers are reported and more to follow.

Two carloads of machinery were observed at the works of the Soda Co. at Keeler yesterday and it is said that some changes may be made there during the coming summer in the way of refining soda.

A carload of No. 1 white and yellow fancy marble went north this week from the marble quarry, its destination being San Francisco and Stockton where it will be used to fill some building contracts. Horace Elder of Lone Pine is at present employed in packing ore to Keeler from near Darwin. He has a train of pack mules containing nearly a dozen mules. E. Moreno also has a ten mule pack train, packing salt from Saline valley to the sheepmen at Monache.

James Jenkins of Georges Creek is among the new arrivals at Keeler, and it is rumored he will take charge of a mine in this district very shortly with the position of superintendent or foreman.

TRAMP.

Drunken Indians.

Last Saturday evening Sheriff Gorman was returning to Independence from Black rock. When passing the house of J. A. Partridge about six miles north of town, the Sheriff was told by Mrs. Partridge to hasten to the dwelling of Emilie Thiebaut as the woman was being attacked by two drunken Indians. Emilie Thiebaut is a French woman aged nearly 60 years. She is unmarried, lives alone and has been in that locality about eight years. The Sheriff drove on rapidly and in a few minutes arrived at the dwelling of Miss Tiebaut. He found the woman struggling with an Indian who was holding her by the hands. She was violently excited. Mr. Gorman jumped out of his carriage, grappled with the Indian, and soon had handcuffs upon him. In the mean time another Indian who was a party to the affair was making off on horseback. The Sheriff followed with his prisoner and meeting two young men of the locality, Edward McGann and Albert Aguirre, he directed them to follow the escaping Indian and arrest him. These young men were on horseback, and they soon overtook the Indian and went with him to the Indian camp near Bell's mill. He had in his possession a demijohn about half full of sour wine. They induced the Indian to come with them to Independence where he was lodged in jail. The examination of the Indian is now going on before a Justice at the Court house. The Indian alleges that he and the other Indian bought the demijohn of wine from Miss Thiebaut, paying her $2.75 for it. The evidence already given by the Sheriff and others will probably be strong enough to warrant committing the Indian for trial on a charge of felony.

Committee Meeting.

A meeting of the Democratic County Central Committtee was held in the Courtroom at Independence on Wednesday evening for the purpose of appointing delegates to the State Convention which meets at San Francisco on the 21st of August. On motion Frank Fitzgerald, J. White Smith and A. W. Eibeshutz were appointed by acclamation. The same appointees were also empowered to act on the joint Congressional and Senatorial convention. Vacancies in the Central Committee caused by removal were filled as follows: Fish Spring, James Jones vice Thos. McLaine; Lone Pine, F. P. Meysan vice M. C. Auton; Keeler, John Fiehman vice J. J. Morton. The Committee adjourned subject to call of the Chair.

William Rowan and H. T. Stebbins had a preliminary examination this week on a charge of having committed an assault with a deadly weapon upon James Hines at Black Rock. After a full hearing of all the testimony, the magistrate decided that there was not sufficient evidence to afford reasonable ground for believing that the defendants could be convicted if sent before a jury for trial, and discharged the men.

Republican Nominees.

The Republican State Convention nominated Estee of Napa for Governor, Millard of Los Angeles for Lieutenant Governor, and Hepburn, Torrence and Van Fleet for Justices of the Supreme Court. From appearance it is probable that the balance of the ticket will read as follows: Attorney-General, Justice Fitzgerald; Secretary of State, L. H. Brown; Treasurer, Redcliff; Controller, Colgan; Superintendent Public Instruction, Bunnel; State Printer, Johnson; Surveyor-General, Uren; Clerk of Supreme Court, Jacobs.

George White, Boss Carpenter of the C. & C. R. R., came down from Hawthorne on Monday and will be at Citrus four or five days. He is putting in a new wheel in the Inyo canal, the old one being so badly broken and out of repair as to be entirely useless. He is accompanied by Mrs. White and baby, who will spend a couple of days in Independence with her son Jay, of the Index force.—Index.

J. W. Murphy returned from the Salt Wells borax works yesterday. He finished putting the machinery in place before leaving, and the plant is now turning out borax at the rate of about one and a half tons per day. Mr. Murphy says they expect to double their working capacity within the next two months. George Meads will do the freighting for the new company.

The Independence Baseball Club express themselves as being very desirous of playing the Bishop nine at Independence on the Fourth. No definite arrangements have been made yet, as they are waiting for the Bishop boys to accept their challenge.

At the residence of the bride's parents at citrus on Wednesday evening Mr. Geo. A. Free and Miss Clara Willet were united in marriage. This office acknowledges the receipt of cake and extends heartiest congratulations.

Supervisor Fitzgerald has closed down the Modock mine for the summer and brought his family into Lone Pine early in the week. Mr. Fitzgerald came up to Independence on Tuesday and spent several days in town.

The local Land Office will soon be removed from its present location in the old INDEPENDENT building to the building now occupied by W. A. Lamar as a law office. The new location is right in the center of town and therefor much more convenient for all concerned.

A big canal is to be constructed to irrigate the Salt River Valley in Arizona. The sum of $2,000,000 is to be expended in the enterprise.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

"That's about as she likes, I expect. She's what I call a true child of nature—changes with the seasons," said the other with a wink. "One of those women with hazel eyes and oval face, and hair all the way from straw color to black, that can make 'emselves look like anything. She's about medium height. When we'd signed the contract at our last interview," he continued, putting on a diabolical leer of retrospective gallantry, "I pressed a chaste salute upon her brow, and didn't have to stoop for it."

"Probably it was the recollection of that embrace that influenced her in throwing up her engagement," remarked Jocelyn dryly. "You're a dangerous fellow with women, Inigo, in some senses! Better make all your salutes parting ones—final partings. Well, to continue, does she speak English?"

"Just as well as I do myself," returned the general emphatically.

"Poor girl!" said Jocelyn as if to himself.

"What are all these questions for, anyhow?" demanded Inigo, after a pause.

"What sort of an actress is she?" went on Jocelyn, not noticing the interruption. "Realistic or conventional or what?"

"Independent, I should call her," said the other. "She doesn't seem to act much anyhow, if you know what I mean. Free—graceful—spontaneous!" he explained, waving his short arm about, with a forkful of mashed potato in his hand. "Worth your money to see her just walk about the stage," he added, engulfing the potato in his enormous jaws.

"She'll do!" said Jocelyn, leaning back in his chair with the air of a man who has succeeded in an arduous and ingenious enterprise. "Your famous Russian diva, my dear Signor Impresario, lives not more than a hundred miles from where we are sitting; and if I know anything about human nature, and hers in particular, she will make her appearance as per advertisement, and sing herself and you up to your chins in bank notes, not to mention my modest little commission!"

"Bah! What ails him now?" said the general, helping himself to another croquette.

"Let me tell you a little story," continued Jocelyn. "About a hundred miles from New York city there lived, once upon a time, a beautiful and talented young lady, only daughter of a father who had brought her up in luxury, refinement and seclusion. This young lady had an amazing genius for music, and a voice so ravishing that the larks came down from the clouds to listen to her, and the nightingales grew hoarse with unavailing rivalry. The best instructor in the world was procured to train her, and in the course of a few years he turned her out finished in every respect. But, unfortunately for mankind, her affluent circumstances forbade her appearance on the public stage. At this juncture, however, a providential change of circumstances altered the entire complexion of her career. She had a brother, a wild and graceless youth, who, finding his native place too narrow for the development of his energies, went forth to investigate foreign lands, with an unlimited letter of credit on the paternal exchequer. Now, this same letter of credit is the specious—specie, I would say—disguise of the fairy who works the transformation. The energetic youth makes use of it to such good purpose that in less than a year from the time of his departure he has not only exhausted the family income, but has made desperate inroads into the capital, most of which has to be sold and the remainder heavily mortgaged—the old gentleman paying all demands for the sake of what he calls the honor of the family, though other people might think it was in order to prove what an incorrigible idiot a man of antiquated prejudices and aristocratic lineage can make of himself when he is afforded the opportunity. The result, at any rate, at the time of which we speak is that the old gentleman finds himself choked with honor and destitute of cash; that he is on the point of being obliged to sell the ancestral mansion in order to satisfy the creditors, and that were the honor he has preserved at so high a price worth anything in the market he might, perhaps, be disposed to mortgage some of it in consideration of an assurance of bread and butter for the rest of his life."

"I've heard of gifted amateurs before now," began Inigo, shaking his big head with a sigh; but Jocelyn interrupted him.

"What you've heard before is nothing to the purpose," said he. "This is precisely the case that contradicts all experience. Now, it so happened that a certain distinguished impresario had spent vast sums and made stupendous preparations to introduce a famous singer to the New York public. It so happened, too, that the diva in question, although so famous, was personally quite unknown in this country; and, as if for the special purpose of insuring the success of the grand enterprise that was preparing, she had even taken a whim to allow no portraits of herself to be exhibited. For some cause, at present unknown to this historian, the diva at the last moment backed out of her contract. The distinguished impresario, with disgrace and ruin staring him in the face, luckily bethought himself to consult the wisest man of his acquaintance, who, by virtue of his presence of mind and penetration, promptly saw the way out of the difficulty. He took the impresario with him to the ancestral mansion aforesaid, where the young lady sang to them and was instantly made the recipient of the following offer by the impresario: That she was to assume and inviolably maintain the name and personality of the Russian diva; that under this name and character she was to come to New York, take up her abode at the most fashionable hotel and receive whatever company will venture to form the acquaintance of a lady with a history so formidably and fascinatingly scandalous as hers. In consideration"——

"Hold on! hold on!" said Inigo, with a shake of his hand in the air, "I see what you're driving at. I didn't take it in at first that your amateur was to appear as the diva herself, as well as to be her substitute. It's a smart notion, but I expect it'll do better to talk about than to try. She'd slip up somehow. She might carry it out for a day or two, but when you come to two or three months, that's another story! It would take a better actress than I've ever come across to"——

"She won't have to act at all," Jocelyn interposed. "The public of course will have made up its mind beforehand that she is the real original diva, and the more unsophisticated she appears the more convinced and charmed they'll be. They'll take her innocence to be the diva's consummate hypocrisy, man alive! and any unfamiliarity she may show on the stage to be the perfection of acting. But, for that matter, when once they've heard her sing they wouldn't exchange her for all the divas in Christendom!"

"If she can sing—yes!" said the impresario rather skeptically.

"Did you ever happen to hear of a gentleman by the name of Dorimar?" inquired Jocelyn, putting down his wristbands and folding his handsome hands on the edge of the table.

"Old Dorimar? Rather! Best man in the profession. Dead now, poor old boy! Ah, if he'd only kept his voice"——

"Dorimar was the instructor I mentioned just now. He went up one day to hear her try her voice, and the consequence was he stayed three years to listen to it. He told me a month before he died that she was the finest soprano, with the grandest method, he'd ever known."

"The devil he did! Dorimar was no fool, that's a fact."

"That's why I told you to make your arrangements to be out of town to-night. We'll take the noon train up there. I've telegraphed 'em to expect me. We'll settle with her to-night, and be back in town to-morrow morning. Now, as to terms. You'll have to pay her what you'd promised the diva."

"Oh, I will, will I? I'll see about that!" returned the impresario with a shrewd grimace. "No need of me believing she's the real diva as well as the audience!"

"In that case we won't take the noon train," said Jocelyn firmly.

"Say, my boy, what's your game?" inquired the other after a pause, during which the men had looked intently at each other. "Do you want me to pay you her salary, and you hand her over whatever doesn't stick to your fingers—is that it? He! he! he!"

"You're a coarse minded idiot," said Jocelyn brusquely. "You attend to your business and let me manage mine. I know what I want and how to get it. If she's not all I say she is, of course the bargain's off altogether. If she is, you'll have to pay for her—that's all. And if you don't like those terms you can get out of your scrape yourself—if you can!"

"You ought to be a rich man, my boy, one of these fine days," remarked the impresario meditatively. "Well, if she comes up to your report I'll agree. But if she doesn't"——

"If she doesn't I'll stand the railway fare there and back!" said Jocelyn, and with that they laughed and rose from the table. As they were passing out of the room a tall young man, with a thick brown beard and severe blue eyes, met them in the doorway. He had a roll of paper in his hand.

"You're the man I'm looking for," he said to Inigo.

"Halloo, Bellingham!" said Jocelyn. "How comes on the Temple of the Muses?"

"All right," replied the gentleman so addressed, rather curtly, as his manner was. He looked at Inigo and added, "There's a p[illegible] the construction of the stage [illegible] I must consult you on."

"I'm in a devil[illegible]," objected the impresario re[illegible]

"I want only ten [illegible]," Bellingham said.

"You architects are [illegible] than—oh, by the way, I can't decide [illegible]out it till to-morrow anyhow," exclaimed the other, as Bellingham began to unroll his paper. He glanced at Jocelyn and went on, "Come to the office to-morrow afternoon and we'll fix it."

"The workmen will have to wait,' said Bellingham.

"Everybody has to do that," returned the impresario sententiously, and with a nod he and Jocelyn went out.

CHAPTER II.

HOW LOVELY AND UNFORTUNATE SHE WAS.

"Music is a sacred thing, my child," he would often say to her.

What is more worthy the contemplation of a humane mind than the spectacle of a pretty young woman? It is the least selfish of all pleasures. By learning we seek to elevate ourselves above our fellows; by philosophy, to console ourselves for the past and to fortify ourselves for the future; by religion (as it is commonly practiced), to make ourselves respectable in this world and comfortable in the world to come. But he who stands rapt in the fascination of a girl's beauty enjoys the possession by another of what he can never have himself, admits his inferiority and generously exults in the existence of goodness for its own sake. The sole drawback is the risk he runs of falling in love—that is, of wishing to restrict to himself a blessing designed to rejoice mankind at large.

It might seem a pity that such a girl as Beatrix Randolph should be so situated as not to have it in her power to confer upon every one the unselfish gratification whereof we speak. But to be rare and difficult of access are among the conditions of mortal loveliness. In no other way, perhaps, could the heavenly aroma be preserved; and were we to become callous to beauty, as we do to pain, life would have nothing left to promise us. On the other hand, dullness is negative, delight positive, and a single day of glorious sunshine compensates for a whole blank week of lifeless landscape and leaden sky.

But Beatrix, though delightful to look upon, was not beauty in the abstract; she was first of all a distinct and concrete human person. It is fitting, therefore, to consider not so much the loss the world sustained by her seclusion, as its effect upon herself. Certainly she was not of a temperament naturally inclined to solitude. She was quick to feel emotions of all kinds, and apt and simple in the expression of them. Her proportions, both of the soul and the body, were symmetrical and active; as she moved easily and sweetly, so was she sweetly and easily moved. Her life, in spite of its circumscribed conditions, showed an instinctive love of largeness and variety, and herein she was helped by a generous and lively imagination. She could not read a story or watch the sun rise without engendering in her mind a thousand fresh ideas of the possibilities of existence. And her body was in such fine harmony with her spirit that you could see a stirring thought turn to roses in her cheeks, or conjure diamonds to her lovely eyes. When she came forth in the morning from her maiden chamber, having put on, let us say, a fresh, white gown, just crisp enough to whisper as she stepped, and a pink or a blue ribbon (as fancy might dictate) at her throat and on her hair, and her figure elastic and alert with the wholesome vigor of nineteen years, and a mouth that laughed fragrance and music, and large brown eyes, which besides being as beautiful as possible in themselves were rendered yet more so by being a few shades darker than her rippled hair and * * * and hands that were white wonders of warm flexibility and tapering softness; when this exquisite young American girl, in short—type of the most charming and most intelligent womanhood in the world—came dawning like Aurora out of the room in which she had been dreaming visions only less lovely than herself, it did seem as if the Golden Age were now about to begin, and as if nothing false or impure were henceforward possible. She explained, without uttering a word, why the grass in spring is so deliciously green, the sky of so tender a blue, why birds sing and water is transparent, why violets have perfume, and the sun warmth. She was the spoken secret of the universe—the interpretation of its fairest elements. By what mishap, then, was such a creature confined (as she was) to a few square miles of village land in the center of the state of New York? Was such a pearl created only to be cast before cattle, and the village grocer's son, and the hollow chested young Unitarian minister, and the innkeeper's daughters? The world could not afford it, and yet there she was, and just at the time this story begins there seemed to be rather less probability than usual of her ever getting anywhere else.

Health.

KILLED HERSELF IN PUBLIC.

How a Bereaved Chinese Fiancee Ended Her Days.

Mr. Medhurst, for many years British consul at Shanghai, tells in the London Million of a singular "card of invitation" which he received in China. It was from a lady, intimating her intention to commit suicide on a specified date. She was very young and attractive and belonged to a wealthy family, but the Chinese gentleman to whom she had been affianced from childhood having died just before the date fixed for their nuptials she gave out that she deemed it her duty to render her widowhood irrevocable by dying with her betrothed. So she sent cards around to the local gentry giving notice of her purpose.

No attempt was made by her relatives or the local authorities to frustrate her design, though Mr. Medhurst appealed to the mandarins, the general opinion being that she was about to perform a meritorious act. Eventually, on the day named, the woman did deliberately sacrifice her life in the presence of thousands of spectators. A stage was erected in the open fields, with a tented frame over it, from which was suspended a strip of scarlet crape. One end of this slip she fastened round her neck, and then, embracing a little boy presented by one of the bystanders, she mounted a chair and resolutely jumped off, her little clasped hands saluting the assemblage as her body twirled round with the tightening cord.

The woman was not hounded on by a fanatic mob, as was the practice at suttees in India, but immolation appeared to be an entirely voluntary act. Sacrifices of this kind, according to Mr. Medhurst, are not uncommon in certain districts of China, and, strange to say, they are rewarded with monuments, sometimes erected by order of the emperor.

Diet For the Aged.

I find, says a writer in The Gentleman's Magazine, that if old people are put on a good meat diet in the way of strong soup, beef tea and animal food, and only just sufficient farinaceous food and fats and sugar to maintain the heat of the body, they increase wonderfully in energy—as they often express it, feel 20 years younger. This is only natural; it is a food of energy, the food that builds up muscle, nerve and constitutional stamina.

The requirements of the system of old age, as a rule, are not very great, and more harm is done by taking too much food than by taking too little. I have known people considerably over 70 to derive the greatest benefit from a thorough change in diet. It seems to rejuvenate them. Of course in old age care should be taken that the body is not subjected to rapid changes in temperature. When the nervous power is decreasing, as the result of old age, and the system is losing power of combating cold and strain upon its energy, a stimulating diet invigorates and is conducive to maintaining constitutional stamina better than any other.

Silence and Speech.

The chief office of silence is to bury all that is evil, and the chief office of speech is to disclose and disseminate all that is good. Let this be done with sincerity and earnestness, and let no criticism discourage it, for its ultimate benefit to character and to conduct is established beyond a doubt. —New York Ledger.

The Pronunciation of Arkansas.

I have traveled in Arkansas, and it is said there that the legal pronunciation is Arkansaw. In the antebellum days, about the time Kansas was admitted as a free state, there was agitation in the state legislature of Arkansas in regard to the state name being mistaken by its similarity to the name of Kansas. One very zealous member of the house moved that the legal pronunciation of the state should be Arkansaw. The proposition was seconded, and passed by a large majority.

So the story goes. To travel the state and say Arkansas and not Arkansaw marks a person among the natives as being a tenderfoot to their soil. As a rule all southern people say Arkansaw, and that, I believe, is why the pronunciation is still kept fresh, as I know that the schools of Kansas and the west teach the pronunciation Arkansas. — Baltimore Sun.

Better Health Obtaining.

The average number of days of sickness in every decade for each man is said to be only 16. Under rules of scientific hygiene and principles of health better practiced, our span of life—be this desirable or the reverse—has, by the evidence of insurance societies, considerably increased. The power of unalleviated physical pain to terrify or trouble is practically at an end with the general use of those benign anaesthetics which have brought a new era of confidence to the hospital and sickroom and taken away all its horror from the surgeon's knife.—Sir Edwin Arnold in Longman's Magazine.

Occupation for an Invalid.

One of the most complete and unique collections of newspaper clippings ever made perhaps was badly damaged by fire in this city about a week ago. It belonged to an invalid who for years has cut the biographical, political and news matter of different daily journals, and pasted the clippings so obtained on sheets for filing, after the manner of a library card catalogue. A very rich collection of accidents, murders, pickpockets, etc., had been amassed, and obituaries, marriages and sudden deaths appeared by the hundred. The owner, nothing daunted, has set about buying old newspapers to repair as far as possible the gap caused by the fire.—Philadelphia Press.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO HIMSELF.

The most inhuman outrages, outrages which would disgrace the savage, man perpetrates upon his own system by swallowing drastic purgatives which convulse his stomach, agonize his intestines and weaken his system. Many people constantly do this under the impression that medicaments only which are violent in their action, and particularly cathartics, are of any avail. Irreparable injury to health is wrought under this mistaken idea. The laxative which most nearly approaches the beneficient action of nature is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which is painless but thorough, and invigorates the intestinal canal instead of weakening and irritating it. The liver and the stomach share in the benign discipline instituted by this comprehensive medicine, whose healthful influence is felt throughout the system. Malarious, rheumatic, kidney and nervous complaints succumb to it.

Statistics show that only 55 per cent of the blondes marry. This may put a new complexion on the hair-bleaching business.

MOTHERS

and those soon to become mothers, should know that Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription robs childbirth of its tortures, terrors and dangers to both mother and child, by aiding nature in preparing the system for parturition. Thereby "labor" and the period of confinement are greatly shortened. It also promotes the secretion of an abundance of nourishment for the child.

Mrs. DORA A. GUTHRIE, of Oakley, Overton Co., Tenn., writes: "When I began taking your 'Favorite Prescription,' I was not able to stand on my feet without suffering almost death. Now I do all my housework, washing, cooking, sewing and everything for my family of eight. I am stouter now than I have been in six years. Your 'Favorite Prescription' is the best to take before confinement, or at least it proved so with me. I never suffered as little with any of my children as I did with my last, and she is the healthiest we've got. Have induced several to try 'Favorite Prescription,' and it has proved good for them."

AFTER LONG ABSENCE.

Here in this room where first we met,
And where we said farewell with tears;
Here, where you swore, "Though you forget,
My love shall deeper grow with years!"

Here, where the pictures on the wall,
The very rugs upon the floor,
The smallest objects you recall—
I am awaiting you once more.

The books that we together read
From off their shelves they beckon me;
All here seems living—what is dead?
What is the ghost I fear to see?

Unchanged am I; did you despise
My love as small?—it fills my heart!
You come, a stranger from your eyes
Looks out, and meeting first we part!
—Lilla Cabot Perry in Cosmopolitan.

MISS STRONG.

Miss Pamelia Strong had reached the mature age of eighteen and never yet experienced the delightful sensation of loving and being beloved. True, she had from time to time ever since she had emerged from pinafores fancied herself in love, but now she was convinced that she had felt only a sentiment, not a passion, and so sighing and hoping for the epoch to arrive when her eyes should be opened she dragged away her melancholy existence.

Her vulgar, low bred brothers and sisters voted her a nuisance, and were never weary with tying her long flaxen curls into knots and using her choicest sonnets to the moon for lamplighters. There is no getting over the fact that Pamelia was an ill used individual, and undoubtedly her unappreciating relatives richly deserved the pillory for their disgraceful, unsympathizing treatment of her gushing affections.

Pamelia—or Millie, as she insisted on calling herself—was a tall, slender young lady, with a naturally pale complexion, which was made still more chalky by the immense quantities of slate pencils and sour vinegar she consumed, under the impression that color in a lady's face was indicative of a gross organization. Millie had a holy horror of health, and would sooner have resigned her fair, scrawny neck to the guillotine than have gained a single pound of flesh.

Her hair was a very pallid shade of flaxen, and by night it was screwed up into the hardest of curl papers, while by day it floated free over her shoulders in "natural" ringlets. Her nose was a long, subdued aquiline—certain indication of genius; her eyes faintly shaded from white to blue; her mouth small and sensitive, and her hands and feet tiny as those of a fairy. Millie was inordinately vain of her feet, and for that reason she discarded flowing robes, and wore her white dresses two inches shorter than the fashion.

If Millie had been endowed with an ordinary degree of sense, she would doubtless have found no difficulty in meeting the destiny of which she was continually pondering; but, as it was, the expected individual held himself aloof, and seemed determined that the interesting Millie should drop into an untimely grave through his coldness and neglect.

Millie was, as might have been expected, a poetess, and unless a person was blessed with unusually strong nerves, it would have given him the nightmare for weeks to have read a dozen pages of her effusions.

Once in her life she had been taken to a concert by a young gentleman rejoicing in the name of Willie Stiggins, and afterward the said Willie had run away from his pa and ma, and embarked on board a whaling vessel. The vessel had been lost with all on board—so said the newspapers; and this circumstance was a windfall to the sentimental Millie. As soon as she heard of Willie's death, she felt that her heart was buried in his ocean grave, and accordingly turned out "In Memoriam" poems by the ream.

But alas for romance! Two years after those touching poems, "To Willie Lying 'Neath the Far Pacific," and "My Lost One in the Sea," had been published in the Greenville Enlightener, the drowned Willie Stiggins turned up in the senior member of the firm of Stiggins, Jenks & Co., whale oil dealers, Long wharf, Boston.

Millie might have saved her tears and her stationery, as Mr. Stiggins had in his possession a black eyed little wife and two black eyed twin children, and was blissfully oblivious of the fact that a die away young lady with flaxen curls was pining and mourning over his presumed burial in the "deep, dark sea."

From her favorite novels and poetry Millie had imbibed an intense admiration for the country, and at length her entreaties to be allowed a summer among its rural shades induced her parents to send her to Bearville for a few months. Mrs. Clash, an old friend of Mrs. Strong's, a nice, matter of fact old lady, residing on a small farm in the outskirts of the village, consented to receive her, and early in June our heroine found herself established in Mrs. Clash's pleasant spare chamber.

Millie was charmed with her situation. She should be sure to meet her fate before she left Bearville. This was just the spot for poets and artists to congregate, and all the long summer days, dressed in white, with clover blossoms in her hair and a volume of Byron in her hand, she wandered up and down the carrot bed, dignified by the name of garden, and waited for the long expected.

Good Mrs. Clash was a little uneasy at her strange conduct. She was pretty well convinced that her boarder was slightly demented, and took the precaution to fasten her bedroom door every night lest the "uncanny" young lady should murder her in her sleep.

One fine day fortune began to smile on our sentimental friend. She was out in the fields back of the village, and approaching too near a brier bush her long curls became entangled and she found it impossible to get clear. Just as she was about to burst into tears—her usual refuge in time of trial—a handsome young man in a blue frock came whistling along and gallantly proceeded to release her from her unpleasant predicament.

She was faint with happiness, for in the dark, handsome face of the unknown she had recognized the twin of her soul! Her fate was decided. At last she was in love!

Before she could collect her scattered faculties sufficiently to inquire his name or give him thanks for his timely assistance, he had passed whistling away and was lost to her view.

Starting up she flew for the house, where with breathless eagerness she burst into the room where Mrs. Clash was darning stockings, frightening the old lady nearly out of her wits.

"Oh, Mrs. Clash!" cried she, "for the love of heaven tell me who wears a blue frock!"

"A blue frock! Good gracious! is the gal crazy?"

"Who wears a blue frock and whistles 'Birdie' divinely?"

"Why, let me see—there's old Eph Bunker and Enoch Place and old Mr. Stubbs and"——

"Forbear!" exclaimed Millie, with a tragic wave of the hand; "he could be none of these. He is one of nature's noblemen—the pole of my existence!" And Millie walked to a window and gazed out as if she would pierce the secrets of futurity.

"What pole was you a-looking at?" inquired Mrs. Clash. "There's the hoppole out there; looks pretty, don't it?"

"Oh, heaven, what shocking vulgarity!" cried Millie, wringing her hands with the anguish of being so dreadfully misunderstood.

"There, dear," said Mrs. Clash soothingly, now well satisfied that her guest was beside herself, "don't feel bad about it. Tell aunty what she was looking for, there's a dear?"

"For my Destiny!" exclaimed Millie tragically.

"Hain't this it, dear?" asked Mrs. Clash, picking up a blue glass smelling bottle from the table.

Millie dashed it angrily to the floor. "Woman," she cried, "tell me who is the divine young man in a blue frock?"

"I don't know, dear," said Mrs. Clash kindly. "You hain't well, I guess; you'd better go to bed; sleep will settle your head;" and she forced Millie off to her chamber, promising to see about the young man with the blue frock and the divine whistle right away.

With this assurance Millie was content to go to sleep, but Mrs. Clash's inquiries did not amount to much, for the next morning she knew no more about Millie's destiny than she did the preceding night. And Millie resolved to take the matter into her own hands. Accordingly, after breakfast, she made a most bewitching toilet and sallied forth toward the village, faintly hoping she might encounter Adonis somewhere on the way.

Her hope was not a vain one. Passing by the blacksmith's shop she heard above the clang of the hammer on the steel that whistle. She would have recognized it among a thousand whistles.

She looked in at the door of the shop. Yes, there he was, the kingly looking fellow, his noble forehead moist with the sweat of toil, his blue frock waving in the wind and his hands engaged in fashioning a horseshoe for some Bearville steed.

Millie stood still in silent thought. Her counterpart had been found, and he was a son of poverty. But should that matter? Should rank separate them? Should caste dissolve the union of their congenial souls? The gods forbid!

She was rich—he was poor; it should be her heart's delight to endow this chosen one with all her wealth of love and gold, and in return she asked but the devotion of his loyal heart.

She gave a ragged little boy a bright quarter and inquired the name of the blacksmith. It was a very musical patronymic, she thought—Frederick Wilder.

The next question was, How should she manage to attract his attention? They had first met under romantic circumstances—met in a rosebush, and it would not be nice to destroy the romance by any commonplace second meeting. A bright idea penetrated Millie's brain.

The canal which supplied the neighboring mill with water ran close to the smithy; she would throw herself into the "flowing tide," and her screams would bring him to the rescue. No sooner thought than the deed was done.

With a loud scream and a louder splash she found herself floundering in the water, which was extremely cold and liberally thickened with frogs. Her skirts kept her from sinking, and her head being above water she had one of the best positions in the world for screaming.

"Help! oh, help! Save me! save me!" cried she at the top of her lungs, expecting to see Mr. Frederick flying to the rescue. But his hammer made so much noise on the horseshoe that he failed to hear her, and her cries brought a lusty Irishman from a ditch he was digging near by to the spot.

"Faith, young lady," remarked Pat, "but that's a cowld bath. Let me assist ye to land. Troth, and it's mighty curis how ye managed to get in."

"Begone," cried Millie, raising her arms at him. "I want none of your help. Don't trouble yourself to lay a finger on me."

"Oh, and it's no throuble at all. Be aisy, now. There she comes! Heave yo!" And Pat, seizing her by the shoulders, despite her kicking and struggling, deposited her on terra firma.

At the top of her speed Millie rushed into the smithy, closely followed by Pat, who thought she must have taken leave of her senses. She flew to the astonished blacksmith, and throwing her arms around him ejaculated:

"Oh, sir, save me from that great, horrid Irishman! Save me! save me!"

"Why, Patrick," exclaimed young Wilder in profound surprise, "what does this mean?"

"It manes jest nothing at all, at all, excipt that I fished the young leddy out from the canal, and she is mad with me for doing the same, divil fly away wid her!" and Pat sauntered off angrily with his hands in his pockets.

Millie clung to the smith's neck, resisting all his efforts to free himself from her embraces.

"Oh, Frederick!" she exclaimed, "I might as well make the revelation now as at any time. I love you—you alone! I will go with you through life! I am rich and you are poor, but the happiness of my life shall be to"——

"My dear young lady, I"——

"I know all that you would say. But love makes us all equal."

"I beg you to allow me"——

"Not a word. It will be no sacrifice. These eighteen weary years I have sighed for thee, I"——

"I'll make you sigh out of t'other side!" burst in a third voice, and an irate woman, with two irate children at her heels, appeared on the scene. "I'll learn you to hug my husband, you mean hussy, you!" and seizing poor Millie by her long ringlets the newcomer whirled her around the shop, to the total disarrangement of ox shoes, chains, iron rings, nail kegs and other kindred articles which were reposing quietly in their accustomed places.

"There!" she cried, dropping Millie in a heap of coal ashes from sheer exhaustion, "that will teach you to meddle with my husband again!"

"Your husband!" gasped Millie, staggering to her feet just in time to fall plump into the arms of Judge Morley, who was entering the shop at the moment.

The judge was a tender hearted man, and pitying the forlorn condition of our heroine he took her home in his chaise.

The acquaintance did not end there. Millie became sensible, quit looking after her destiny, and six months afterward Judge Morley led her to the altar. So our sentimental young lady met her destiny in a smithy after all.—True Flag.

A Lively Awakening.

"There's something about a flower"—said the poet dreamily, as he laid a reverent hand on the blooming rose. And just then a bee emerged from the blossom and proved it in a most pointed manner.—Exchange.

NAVAJO INDIANS.

The Tribe of Thrifty Red Men That are Living in New Mexico.

A LESSON KIT CARSON TAUGHT THEM

Picturesque Appearance in Their Autumnal Trading Visits to Town.—Their Past History.

"The most interesting people that I saw of the many races of the southwest," said the tourist newly returned from a transcontinental trip, "were the Navajo Indians in New Mexico. Arriving at Albuquerque late at night, I had begun to dress about half past 8 o'clock the next morning, when a trampling of hoofs called me to the window, and looking out the town seemed to be in the hands of Indians. Through the doors of the large stores on the main street Indians were passing in and out or, grouped upon the platforms, were examining and cheapening goods as earnestly as country people might do in a New England village on cattle show day. But how picturesque, even in sordid bargaining, were these dusky children of the plains and mountains!

"Down the center of the wide sandy street a dozen mounted Indians were driving a band of young, unbroken horses, some riding ahead to prevent a stampede in that direction, and the others, in a half circle behind, urging forward the herd. Here were perhaps 50 wild steeds which had never known stable, fodder, bridle or spur, stepping high and prancing, with wild eyes glancing suspiciously about and tossing manes and tails. Every few yards they would all gather together with their heads toward the center, and it was with difficulty that this circle could be broken and the horses urged along. At a square a little way down the avenue the herd was held by its riders, a crowd of people gathered, and trading evidently begun at once at a lively rate.

"'What does all this crowd of Indians mean?' I asked of the boy from Missouri who brought up my hot water.

"'Them's Navajos,' he said. 'The first lot of 'em's just got inter town ter do their fall trading. They've brung blankets and ponies ter swap for silver dollars and store truck.'

"After breakfast, when I went out on the street, I was much impressed by the appearance and ways of these aborigines. Both men and women are of good size, with massive figures, open, intelligent faces and impressive dignity of manner. Lighter in tint than many of the Indian tribes, their features display markedly the Tartar characteristics. To me they as strongly suggested a Mongolian as some other Indian peoples do a Semitic derivation.

"They come in from their reservation every autumn in parties varying in number from a single family up to 50 or 60 members and camp just outside the town, sleeping in the open air or sheltered by old army tents and blankets stretched from poles. Every day of my stay they came into the public square or upon the main street to trade. To see these dusky riders sitting in unstudied picturesque attitudes upon their ponies, holding in check a herd of restless horses while waiting for buyers, was a sight that beat pictures. They wore sombreros or old style but costly fur caps bought from the traders, and some of them had Mexican spurs at their heels. Otherwise their costumes were pure Navajo, with buckskin or calico jumpers, buckskin leggings, moccasins and massive silver ornaments in the shape of bracelets, earrings and crescent charms hammered out from Mexican dollars by their native jewelers. Here and there in the chill morning a Navajo would stalk along draped in one of those splendid woolen blankets which they weave themselves of most substantial texture in great variety of barbaric colors and designs. Although their features were in general impassible, there was an intangible air among these Indians of being on a picnic, and sometimes at some mishap, such as the struggle of a purchaser with an intractable colt, they would roll in their saddles in uproarious laughter. There were no signs that any of them had indulged in firewater, and I think that among Indians in general the Navajos, like the Pueblos, rank pre-eminent in sobriety. They are too good business men to take the chances of loss through drunkenness. The squaws, who rode astride their horses man fashion, were comely, luxuriant and shapely of figure and both modest and independent if sometimes a little fierce of demeanor.

"The Navajo Indians up to a time about 30 years ago were the scourge of all civilized races of New Mexico, the peaceful Pueblo Indians being favorite victims of their depredations. Unlike other Indians, they, owing perhaps to the Tartar origin already hinted at, have always inclined to a pastoral life and to accumulate flocks and herds. The Utes and Apaches, when raiding ranches and villages, would feast inordinately upon the flesh of cattle and sheep, maiming and slaughtering many animals from mere wantonness. They would take back to their rancherios—villages—with them only horses and mules and asses which could be ridden or driven ahead at a gallop. The Navajos, on the contrary, would drive to their mountain fastnesses all the cattle, sheep and goats they could capture and collect to add to the stock they already had. When the famous frontiersman, Colonel Kit Carson, in 1862, made his historic campaign against the Navajos, he found no way so effective to reduce them to submission as, after wasting their fields and destroying their villages, to kill all their stock.

"Since the lesson of that campaign the Navajos have never been on the warpath, but having renewed their flocks and herds, with some early assistance from the government, have gone steadily on increasing in numbers and wealth. They number now nearly 20,000 souls. Unlike most Indian tribes, they are self supporting, requiring no annuities or rations. They own several hundred thousand—some say a million—sheep and many thousand cattle and ponies. Their reservation in northern New Mexico and Arizona contains nearly 6,000 square miles, and they use a wide adjoining region of government land for range."—New York Sun.

Lucky, but He Died to Win.

Very few people get a life insurance as quickly as the late Jabez A. Bostwick. He left a large fortune and had so great an interest in speculation that he purchased a seat on the New York stock exchange in order to save commissions. He was the very first man out of the 1,100 members to die after joining, and is probably the only member of the exchange who died holding a seat upon which he had not paid a single death assessment. His purchase paid the estate $10,000 in a single week.—New York Letter.

THICKNESS OF GLACIERS.

These Monster Fields of Ice May Measure Over 6,000 Feet Through.

The most recent researches, according to M. Falsan, show that the thickness of the ice has been usually underestimated. A terminal moraine on the Jura at Chasseron is 4,000 feet above the sea, or 2,770 feet above Geneva. In order that the upper surface of the ice should have had sufficient incline to flow onward as it did, it was probably 5,000 or 6,000 feet thick below Martigny and 4,000 or 5,000 feet over the middle of the lake.

It is certain, at all events, that whatever thickness was necessary to cause onward motion that thickness could not fail to be produced, since it is only by the onward motion of some outlet or lowland where the ice can be melted away as fast as it is renewed that indefinite enlargement of a glacier is avoided. The essential condition for the formation of a glacier at all is that more ice should be produced annually than is melted away. So long as the quantity produced is on the average more than that melted, the glacier will increase, and as the more extended surface of ice up to a certain point, by forming a refrigerator, helps its own extension a very small permanent annual surplus may lead to an enormous extension of the ice. Hence, if at any stage in its development the end of the glacier remains stationary, either owing to some obstacle in its path or to its having reached a level plain where it is unable to move onward, the annual surplus of ice produced will go to increase the thickness of the glacier and its upper slope till motion is produced.

The ice then flows onward till it reaches a district warm enough to bring about an equilibrium between growth and dissolution. If, therefore, at any stage in the growth of a glacier a thickness of 6,000, 7,000 or even 8,000 feet is needed to bring about this result, that thickness will inevitably be produced.

We know that the glacier of the Rhone did move onward to the Jura and beyond it; that the northward branch flowed on beyond Soleure till it joined the glacier of the Rhine, and that its southern branch carried Alpine erratics to the country between Bourg and Lyons, 250 miles from its source. We know, too, that throughout this distance it moved at the bottom as well as at the top, by the rounded and polished rocks and beds of stiff bowlder clay which are found in almost every part of its course.—Fortnightly Review.

Schumann and Mendelssohn.

The influence which Schumann's art has exercised and is exercising in modern music cannot be overestimated. In conjunction with Chopin and Liszt he dominates at this time the whole literature of the piano, while the piano compositions of his great contemporary, Mendelssohn, which were once exalted at Schumann's expense, would seem to be vanishing from the concert programme. In conjunction with his predecessor, Franz Schubert, and in a higher degree than any contemporary—not even Robert Franz excepted—he pervades the literature of the musical "romance," while even here Mendelssohn is relegated ad acta. What a strange retribution of fate! It is the old story of Nemesis. Mendelssohn received, as it were, more than his due of admiration in advance; Schumann less than his due. Posterity had to balance their accounts. But it has, according to my opinion, in its demand for justice identified itself so completely with Schumann and his cause that Mendelssohn has been unfairly treated or directly wronged. This is true, however, only as regards the above mentioned genres, the piano and the musical romance. In orchestral compositions Mendelssohn still maintains his position, while Schumann has taken a place at his side as his equal. I say his equal, for surely no significance can be attached to the circumstance that a certain part of the younger generation—Wagnerians chiefly—have fallen into the habit of treating Schumann, as an orchestral composer, de haut en bas.—Century Magazine.

Rose From the Ranks.

The best engineman has been a fireman; the best conductors are made of brakemen; the best officials are promoted from the ranks. Mr. John M. Toucey, general manager of the New York Central, was once a trainman. President Newell of the Lake Shore used to carry a chain in an engineering corps on the Illinois Central. President Clark of the Mobile and Ohio was a section man, afterward a fireman. Another man who drove grade stakes is President Blackstone of the Alton. Allen Manvill, the late president of "the largest road on earth," was a storehouse clerk. President Van Horn of the Canadian Pacific kept time on the Illinois Central. A man named Town, who used to twist brake wheels on the Burlington, is now Vice President Town of the Southern Pacific. President Smith of the Louisville and Nashville was a telegraph operator. Marvin Hughitt of the Chicago and Northwestern began as a telegraph messenger boy. President Clark of the Union Pacific used to check freight and push a truck on the Omaha platform. The Illinois Central, I believe, has turned out more great men than any other road. President Jeffery of the Denver and Rio Grande began in the Central shops at 45 cents a day.—McClure's Magazine.

Had Investigated.

One of the hind wheels of a truck suddenly gave way on Michigan avenue, and the usual crowd gathered to see and speculate.

"Too heavily loaded," observed one in a self complacent way.

"The sudden jar did it as it fell into that rut," remarked a second.

"The axletree wasn't heavy enough anyway," added a third.

Several others passed remarks of a like nature, and then a bootblack, who had been carefully investigating causes and results, suddenly straightened up and said:

"Gentlemen, owin to a flaw in de iron de axletree broke short off, and de owner of de vehicle is entitled to a new one widout furder cost. Move on, now, and don't embarrass de gent as drives de team, see!"—Detroit Free Press.

Swore Like Seward.

Secretary Seward was an Episcopalian, and this story is told: On one of the occasions when President Lincoln's patience was tried by a self appointed adviser, who got warm and used strong language, Mr. Lincoln interrupted him by saying, "You are an Episcopalian, aren't you?" And when asked why he thought so said, "You swear just like Seward, and he is." That was Mr. Lincoln's way of getting rid of such advisers.—Springfield Republican.

Movable scenery was first used in theaters in 1508. It was invented by Baldassare Peruzzi and displayed in Rome before Leo X.

LANDING BIG FISH

Catching a Huge Muskellunge May be a Very Rare Sport Indeed.

A SOMEWHAT VIVID DESCRIPTION.

A Fisherman Writes From the Wilderness About the Occupation of Some Hardy Sportsmen.

There are four of us in this pilgrimage into the wilderness—Mr. F. N. Lewis, a Main street merchant of Louisville, and his son, a student of fair Harvard; Colonel Weir, of Owensboro, a typical Kentuckian, and the Georgia pilgrim. With wonderful preparations for fish slaughter we have penetrated to the farthest extreme, headquartering at the Elliot. This is no Arlington. The glimmer of a few white tents bespeaks the presence of a party of campers, and this is as near the chair warming feature as woods hostelry can boast of.

The breath of the balsam woods fans the tanned cheek, the same air that Bayard Taylor has described "as grateful to the lungs as Falerian to the palate." The clear, cold waters rush and swirl in tortuous channels ranging from bowlder lined shore swallows to fifteen fathoms. Merrily they dash their green waves, striped with golden sun rays, upward to catch the blue of the cloudless ether. This is the home and haunt of the bass and pickerel and trout and the majestic and gamy muskellunge.

McGulpin is the guide. Brown of face and with a cheery smile he looks like a battercake with a dab of honey on it. From Elliot's he leads us through the spruce forest a half mile over a velvety turf formed of the fallen spruce leaves, as soft as a Persian carpet, and we come out on the most lonesome expanse of water I ever saw. It is between great islands, but the entrances on either side are narrow and winding.

The trolls are out. The silent oarsman bends to his work. The quiet is depressing. Not a sound disturbs the eternal silence. Even the oars dip without more than a ripple. Only two lines follow in the wake of the boat. The colonel and the student have gone away to themselves, too far off to note their luck. The moments lengthen out—and then the line lengthens too. What is this? Have I caught a hidden rock? Queer rock to lash tail like that! In it comes, tugging and raging, and with open mouth threatening a modern edition of Jonah, to lie panting and wrestling in the boat—a 10-pound pickerel.

With a line pulling out almost as fast as one is pulling in and the waters white with contagious rage of a finny gladiator, there could be no recollection of the depressing heartburn and provoking cough of indigestion. To be fishing where there never are mosquitoes or malaria or even black flies and other insects contributes to the sources of universal charity and generosity. Even the hay fever patient snuffs only the battle with the trout.

But to catch a muskellunge—a palpitating, throbbing, gamy aggregation of five and twenty pounds of aqueous life—you Brier creek men must wait for that before you come to tell what luck you have had. Oh, you swamp fishermen, gently throw out your line, and watch that no leaf or lilypad or stalk of bulrush entangles its intrusive green upon your glittering spoon. Did you feel a gentle tug? Draw up—you have caught a weed. Take it off and carefully let your 100 feet of line out again.

Permit the line to lie along the fore finger, pressing the tips. Lounge not, sit steadily, drawn up like a tiger ready to spring, alert and lithe in an instant. That glittering, revolving spoon, spinning on its swivel, will be seen presently. Look out, is your arm out of joint? Gather yourself. Never mind McGulpin's chuckle, for he will look out for oars; you look out for yourself. You have hitched a lightning express train, and it is billed through. Haul in, keep taut; oh, for your life don't slack the line. Blood on your finger? All right, that will cool your fever a little; it is only the line that has cut through into the flesh.

Come in steady, jerk not, still come in. You can't? You must. Take a good breath. Never mind McGulpin, he is pulling toward shore. There he goes, that hillock of foam means one fearful strike for life. It must be tiger against tiger now. Let him tangle your line and he is safe. Ah, that rush means business, never mind the boat, go overboard, but hold that line tight. Pull, pull, pull—oh, pull, for a yard of slack will raise the laugh on you. Good, McGulpin, the bow is among the bulrushes and the shore is near. The lashing monster feels the tickling of the bulrushes, and he knows that means speedy death. Now for one last, mad, despairing effort.

Straight up into the air he shoots himself, his lithe sides sparkling with drops that glisten like diamonds, a volcano of hot rage. Let him have his way, let out the line just so much. How much? Enough to keep him from snapping it in twain, and not enough for him to loosen that hook; this is his one grand chance for life. He flings himself like a circus acrobat, nose pointed away from boat and shore. Now, if you know anything, let him go, but only until with gentle pressure you can turn him as a tug will tow a great ship around. Is he off? No. That white turbulent circle means that he is still hooked and your skill is bringing him toward you again. Will he try another leap?

He would if he knew how out of breath you are, standing there quivering like a frightened girl, panting and with eye aflame with delirious intoxication. Draw in steady, the boat is in the shallows. What's that brushing your legs? Never mind; it is McGulpin crawling aft with his gaff hook. Are you going to lose your quarry? You see him plainly now, six feet away. Will he shoot that monstrous power against the boat and tear himself away to freedom? You may have the muskellunge agne and lose everything if you are not cool and steady.

Lean out, throw that right arm as far as possible from the boat. Suppose you do fall out. Stand up to your armpits, but don't lose your taut hold. There he is, his tiger eyes, bloodshot and defiant, glaring at you. Now for McGulpin—you have done all that man can do. Steadily the guide reaches out the gaff—a plunge, a mighty lashing—a peaceful flash—out you go—up the bank—falling limp and breathless on the sweet, soft boughs of spruce, while McGulpin hauls in, hand over hand, your 40-pound muskellunge.—Cor. Forest and Stream.

Rats on Shipboard.

It was a very great while before the mariner came to realize that among the perils which beset his calling he must reckon the existence of rats on shipboard as by no means an insignificant one. That sailors have for centuries viewed the vermin with a superstitious eye is evident upon the testimony of many old writers.

EDUCATED INVENTORS.

A Mistake Too Frequently Made by Men Who Write Biographies.

Mark Twain, in his novel, "The American Claimant," introduces his readers to a mechanics' club debate, the manifest object being to satirize the socialistic tendencies of the workmen of the present day. One of the speakers, a self educated printer, delivers a long harangue to prove that we "overrate the college culture share in the production of the mighty progress" of the nation. "In looking over a list of inventors," he continues, "I find that they were not college bred men. Of course there are exceptions, but these exceptions are few."

Now it has long been a custom and a very pleasant one no doubt that as soon as a man has risen to great prominence his friends have sought to add luster to his glory by making his origin more humble than it really was and representing his education as having been practically neglected. In the life of a presidential candidate, got up for campaign purposes, this may be all very well, for our partisanship makes us all very credulous, but in the work of a standard author it is entirely different.

Now the writer is well aware that Mark Twain is such a funny man that it is often difficult to know when to take him seriously. But in the present instance it is manifest that Mr. Clemens has allowed his reason to be carried away by the popular fallacy that the great inventors were men of little or no education, who started out in life with vague ideas of the alphabet and multiplication table. To say that the inventors, with very few exceptions, were not college bred is to make a misstatement that could have been rectified at the expense of a very little research.

To take only the more noted names in the field of American invention, we find that Morse was not only educated at Yale, but that he achieved success as a portrait painter long before he ever dreamed of having his name connected with the electric telegraph. While very poor in early life, Whitney was quick to see the advantages of education, and endured many hardships for the sake of working his way through Yale college. Corliss received a good academic education, and knew enough to construct a machine for sewing heavy leather before he had ever seen the inside of a machine shop.

Fulton was a man of education, and was a landscape painter by profession before he became interested in mechanics. The elder Roebling graduated at the Berlin Polytechnic school, and his son was educated at the Rensselaer institute. Gatling was not only educated, but he studied medicine and took a degree. Moncure Robinson, one of our pioneer railroad constructors and the builder of the Philadelphia and Reading road, was designed for the law, and was educated in the Gerardine academy and William and Mary college.

Dahlgren and Ericsson received a military education, the latter having the title of LL. D. Rodman, of gun and powder fame, was a graduate of West Point, and Thurston, to whom we are indebted for more than one invention, was educated at Brown university. The list could be greatly extended if we included the names of men noted for their discoveries in the sciences, who must of necessity have had the highest education. It is poor policy at best for self educated men to attempt to undervalue the advantages of a liberal education.

No inventor need be afraid that he will handicap himself in his work by going through college. To state that Howe and Edison received very little education in early life proves nothing in an argument on this subject. While they deserve all the more credit on that account, who can deny that their services to the world might not have been even greater than they are if they had started out in life with the advantages of a college education?—Mechanical News.

A Punctual Red Man.

Matthias Splitlog, chief of the Wyandottes, lives in Kansas, and being known to possess about a million dollars' worth of property is called the wealthiest Indian in America. Although over seventy years of age, and unable to read or write, he is a keen business man. By his shrewdness and ability he has acquired large tracts of land in Kansas and Missouri, houses and lots in Kansas City, and has money invested in a number of paying enterprises.

The white men to whom he gave a $20,000 lesson in punctuality had persuaded him to sell them a certain tract of land for $140,000, and were to pay him the money at 10 o'clock at a bank in Kansas City. On the appointed morning, a few minutes before the hour named, the old Indian entered the bank and took a seat, with his eye fixed upon a clock. The capitalists had not appeared when the hands of the clock reached the hour. As it began to strike the old Indian arose to his feet and at the last stroke of the clock he promptly walked out of the building. On the street, less than a block away, he met the men who were to buy his land hurrying toward the bank. They begged him to return with them, but he refused, saying that if they still wished to deal with him he would meet them at 10 o'clock on the following day at the same place.

This time both the white men and the Indian were promptly on hand, but when the former offered old Matthias the price agreed upon for the land he told them that while $140,000 was yesterday's price today's price was $160,000, and to these terms they finally were compelled to accede.—Harper's Young People.

Crosses Imprinted by Lightning.

Crosses imprinted by lightning are very old, for Gregory Nazianzen declares that in the year 360 A. D. they were imprinted upon the bodies and clothing of workmen occupied in rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem. At the end of the Sixteenth century a similar thing occurred at Wells cathedral. Cassaubon, who derived his information from Dr. Still, the bishop, says that during divine service in the cathedral two or three claps of thunder were heard, which frightened the worshippers so much that they all threw themselves on the ground. Lightning flashed without hurting any one present, but it was afterward found that crosses had been imprinted upon the bodies of all who were in the church.—Chambers' Journal.

IFS OF HISTORY.

What This Great World Might Have Been if it Wasn't for Them.

THE MANY DIFFERENT EXAMPLES.

Perhaps the Present Stage Would be Reached Even if Some Events Had Not Been That Way.

It is or once was a favorite plan of examiners to ask, "What would have been the consequences if such and such an event had not occurred?" Scope was thus given to the historical imagination, and a man could show both knowledge and fancy. In our own lives we know how much hangs on trifles. You take one side of a street and miss a fortune or an affection, which might have been yours had you taken the other side. You neglect to answer a letter; you pick up an old lady who has been run over by a cab—nay, you look up and see your fate, instead of looking down and missing her—and all your life is altered. So it is, too, in the history of nations.

Suppose the king had not halted at Varennes; suppose James' nose had not bled at Salisbury; suppose somebody, whose name I forget, had done as he proposed to do at Queen Anne's death; suppose the Medes had won at Marathon, or the Saracens at Tours, or Hasdrubal at the Metaurus; suppose that Napoleon had not suffered from indigestion at Waterloo, or that Grouchy had not misinterpreted his orders—and where is history? Nay, take a case on which we cannot dwell, and which suggests reflections which every one can make for himself. Suppose a certain Roman governor had been an honest man!

There is a kind of fanciful pleasure in answering these problems; but, on the whole, would the turn of a straw, which seemed to be so momentous, have made much difference? We know how our character shapes our lives, and we doubt whether accident is so potent after all. Say you meet the wrong fate and marry unhappily. Would you have been luckier with another fate? Say you miss a fortune by a slight neglect. Has not your whole career been a series of slight neglects? You take up a tract and are converted, or you have a vision like Colonel Gardiner or Pascal.

I am certain that Colonel Gardiner's conversion had long been ripening; one day or another the vision would have come, whether he was waiting for that particular lady or for another. If not that tract some other tract would have produced its results; you were maturing for that psychological alteration. If we apply this to national instead of individual life we may appear that the accidents were not so very momentous. Say that the French king had reached the frontier. Tant mieux pour lui, but the revolution would have gone on. Say that Grouchy had "come up," and that Napoleon had been well.

We and the united continent were not so near the end of our resources as France was; we should still have beaten the Corsican on another field. Besides, Grouchy's blunder was not an accident. It was part of a habit of missing chances which had sprung up in the French army ever since the defeats in the peninsula, themselves consequent on Napoleon's undertaking too much even for him. Say the Persians had won at Marathon. Could they have held Greece as they held the Ionians, so that Greek civilization would have expired? In all probability that was quite impossible for Persia. For once, in spite of oligarchs and jealousies, Hellas would have united in resistance; she might even have gained by the struggle.

Say that Carthage had supported Hannibal and had allied herself with Philip of Macedon. They could not have held Italy; they could not have reduced Rome to a village and imposed a new civilization on the world. Had Edward II been Edward I, Bannockburn would have been lost, but you could no more subdue Scotland than we can hold Afghanistan. If Charles had marched on London from Derby, if the Welsh squires had come in and if the English Jacobites had been true hearted, still in a very few years James would have been sent packing again. History would have gained a romantic page, but England would be much what she is at present.

The king would not have had a better chance than Louis XVII and Charles X; he would have squandered his opportunities as readily. Had the Armada landed her men England would have suffered, but few of the invaders would have seen Spain again. Had Charles Martel been defeated the Saracens, in the long run, would have met the fate of their countrymen in Spain. The movement of the world may be deferred, but not actually diverted. The great stress of national character and circumstance is stronger than any accident of war.

This way of looking at history robs it of romance to some extent, and I fear encourages political fatalism. What can we do against a great tidal wave of influence, rising far away in the deeps of the past and sweeping gradually up and breaking on us? Well, we can do what we may. We can modify the impact of the wave, we can adapt ourselves to its lift and stress, or we can decline to recognize it. England was fated to absorb Scotland to a great extent, but she struggled so well and refused so long to obey destiny in one particular form that another and honorable form at last overtook her.

She was not dragged under by the swell, but rode cocking on the crest of the tide. It is something to recognize that we are not slaves of the turn of a straw, but are obedient to wide and probably salutary laws. King James might have come to his own again once if his friends had not stopped for the other glass at a tavern. Yes, but they were always stopping for that other glass. That was the general rule of their natures, and the constitution of things was against it and them. It was not merely the one extra toss of brandy that did the business.—Andrew Lang in London Illustrated News.

How to Scare Off Mosquitoes.

Before taking your next outing on the shore or in the woods provide yourself with a bottle of pennyroyal extract. Do not hesitate to rub it plentifully over the face, neck, hands and any exposed part of the body. Even the most determined mosquito will avoid the neighborhood abundantly scented with pennyroyal.

It is a singular fact that although last year enormous fields of ice had begun to invade the so called "steamer lanes" of the Atlantic at the opening of spring, there has been comparatively little ice this year.

...DEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, JUNE 29 1894

Senator Squire of Washington has introduced a new silver bill. It proposes to permit owners of silver bullion to deposit the same at the mints and receive in exchange for it silver dollars equal to the value of the bullion on the day of the deposit, the difference between the bullion value and the nominal value of the standard dollar to be used as a reserve fund to maintain the parity of silver dollars. This measure apparently differs from all silver-coinage measures heretofore introduced, but may in practice work as effectually as an absolute free coinage measure in raising the price of silver. If all the silver bullion taken to the United States mints were to be received in exchange for dollars it would not take long to send the price of silver up to $1 29 an ounce, for the result of such action would be to drain the markets of the world, and the struggle which would necessarily follow to obtain supplies would drive up prices. If the bill has been correctly summarized we may infer that Senator Squires object is to set at rest certain objections urged against silver by gold monometallists. Chief among these is that which takes the form of declaring that the purpose of the advocates of free coinage is to enable silver miners to obtain more than their product is worth. If no more than the market price to be paid in standard dollars, is allowed, this objection is removed. The Senator may also have another object, namely, to force into circulation silver dollars. If standard dollars were paid out for all the silver bullion that presented itself, and the monthly coinage limited to $4,000,000, the actual dollars would soon be in circulation. If there is no limit on the amount of silver that would be received at the mint, bimetallists, we think, would not object to Squire's plan, for while it does not provide for free coinage, it paves the way to such a result. The radical defect of all the other plans, the Allison amendment of the Bland act, the Sherman silver purchase act, the Windom method and all other compromise suggestions, is that they placed a limit on the amount of silver to be received and thus defeated their own purpose.

The people of California have to thank Senator White for getting grain bags put on the free list. The McKinley act puts a tax of forty two per cent on grain bags, and that has cost the farmers of California millions of dollars, all to protect one factory in Oakland run by L. P. Drexel by gangs of chinamen. Let the farmers of the San Juaquin valley try to compute the dollars that have been wrung out of their pockets by this infamous tax, and consider which party in Congress is laboring in their interest. It does not appear that a single Republican from the Pacific Coast did anything to assist Senator White in the matter of getting free grain bags for the farmers of California.

General Barnes delivered his speech against Estee in Sacramento as he said he would. It was a straightforward, dignified statement of his objections to Mr. Estee as the nominee of his party, and its sarcasm was keen and cutting. However, it had no effect, as the program was carried out to the letter, and Mr. Estee received the nomination on the first ballot, as Boss Burns said he would.

The nomination of Estee will have one good effect, anyhow. It will stimulate the study of ancient history, for a good many people will want to know what the great statesman thought about General Grant in 1872, when both of them were in their prime, and when Estee's intellect was a good deal clearer than it is now, even if his conscience was not so fully developed.

For a party that has been gaining at the rate of about two thousand a minute the populists made a very poor showing in the late State election in Oregon. They received several thousand votes less than they had two years ago, which is a sure indication of a speedy dissolution of the fiat money organization.

BORN.

MUNN—At Bishop June 20, 1894, to Mr. and Mrs. James Munn, a daughter.

Summer weather now in dead earnest.

A. O. Collins spent a couple of days in town this week.

Fred Burckhardt of Lone Pine was in town yesterday.

E. H. Edwards of Lone Pine left for San Francisco last Saturday.

The Hines case will be tried in Justice Davidson's Court next Tuesday.

E. Moiver arrived home last Monday from a short visit to San Francisco.

C. W. Craig and T. C. Boland arrived home last Monday from Sacramento.

W. M. Richards came up from Keeler on Tuesday, returning next day.

Mrs. A. L. Conklin and daughter started for San Francisco on yesterday's train.

Mr. and Mrs. P. H. Mack spent a couple of days at Big Pine early in the week.

Under-Sheriff Holland went to Bishop yesterday and will probably return to-morrow.

Miss Ritta Drake of Bishop will read the Declaration of Independence on the Fourth of July.

Dr. McQueen continues to be very busy and will probably remain here until after the Fourth.

Mrs. J. J. Stewart of Lone Pine and Mrs. J. G. McLean of Darwin were in town last Tuesday.

Charley Anthony came in from Darwin yesterday, returning to-day. He reports all quiet in that section.

There is a strong probability that Judge Jackson Temple will be the Democratic candidate for Governor.

The hay crop in this vicinity is very light this year. It will probably average no more than two tons per acre.

There will be a baseball game at Independence on the Fourth between a Lone Pine nine and the Independence second nine.

Board of Supervisors meet in regular session next Monday. They will also meet as a Board of Equalization at the same time.

There is a good prospect for a lively foot race at Independence on the Fourth. See the challenge and acceptance published elsewhere.

W. H. Walker accompanied by his mother went to Olancha yesterday. Webb will make his quarterly postoffice report and return Sunday.

For the fourth time since the race was established Lucky Baldwin has won the American Derby. Last Saturday his horse Key el Santa Anita won the event in 2:36, the same time made by Boundless last year.

Chas. Foster and C. L. White, agents for the Union Mutual Building and Loan Association have been canvassing this section for the past two weeks and report good success. Early in July a branch agency will be established here. They went to Bishop to-day.

It is reported that four Big Piners were lucky enough to draw $900 each in a lottery. While we congratulate them on their good fortune, it must be borne in mind that for every dollar paid out by these institutions they receive two in return, and the great mass of people who patronize them are losers in the end.

W. L. Zimmerman came down from Bishop on Wednesday and spent several days in town this week. As will be seen by an announcement in another column he will be a candidate for the office of County Treasurer before the Democratic County Convention. Mr. Zimmerman is well known throughout the country as an honest upright citizen and his claims merit the attention of his party.

Programme.

The following programme will be observed at the Fourth of July celebration at Independence:

Big Boom at Red Rock.

MOJAVE, June 23.—Mining at Red Rock about thirty miles from here has received a new boom through the discovery of several valuable nuggets. One nugget taken from the claim of Billy Neveris to-day weighed twenty-two ounces. In addition to the rich gold discoveries, water has been found in unlimited quantity at the Bonanza mine and the promise of a great boom is in sight. Already great quantities of gold have been brought here from the placer diggings in that vicinity, and with the aid of the Bonanza water plant now being connected, the gold fields are bound to take the lead. About $170 was obtained yesterday by a single man through the dry washer process, and with the aid of water nearly double that amount could have been secured. Many people are flocking to these fields and the town is booming in consequence.

Through the Mountains

A party of students from the State University at Berkeley arrived at Independence last Sunday morning. They came from Visalia up Kings River and crossed the water shed of the Sierra Nevada mountains through Kearsarge pass directly west of us. It is early in the season to cross at that point and they found the air very cold at an altitude of over twelve thousand feet. On Sunday afternoon the party went on from here to Mr. Moffett's place at Georges Creek intending to start from that point next morning for Mt. Whitney. It is their intention after ascending the mountain to go down the north fork of Kern river as far as Kern Lake, then return to Independence and go north to Mono Lake, and from there cross the mountains to Yosemite, and thence home. The party consists of Messrs. Corbett, Gibbs, Houston and Sutro. They are all vigorous young men and appear to be enjoying the trip heartily.

Illegal.

The Supreme Court has decided that no sheep license can be legally collected from a sheep owner whose sheep are merely passing through the county demanding the payment of a license. The Chronicle—Union has always contended that a license collector had no right to demand a license for sheep in transit through a county, a practice in vogue in Tuolumne county. In an El Dorado case Judge Arnot decided that such a license could not be collected legally, and now the Supreme Court settles the question permanently.—Chronicle—Union.

Challenge and Acceptance.

INDEPENDENCE, Cal., June 28, 1894.

I hereby challenge any man in Inyo County (Ed. Ober barred) to run 100 yards for $500. Race to be run on the Fourth of July or any suitable time.

THOS. TAYLOR.

KEELER, Cal., June 27, 1894.

I will accept the challenge of Thos. Taylor to run any man in Inyo county (Ed. Ober barred) 100 yards for $500 and will meet him at Independence on July 3d and arrange match. W. E. SPENCER.

Francois Carnot, President of France, was assassinated in the streets of Lyons last Sunday evening. The assassin was an Italian, 22 years of age, and a Nihilist. The greatest excitement prevails throughout France. The murderer was captured by the police who had the greatest difficulty in preventing him from being torn to pieces by the populace. The awful crime causes a feeling of horror throughout the civilized world.

A meeting of the directors of the 18th District Agricultural Association will be held at Independence on Thursday evening July 5th for the purpose of making suitable arrangements for holding the next fair. If any racing is to be held in connection with the fair this fall, the citizens of Independence should take immediate steps toward raising a sufficient sum of money for that purpose.

There is a general strike on all railroad lines west of Chicago and in consequence no through mail later than Tuesday will be received. The strike originated with the Pullman-car employés.

If some grocers urge another baking powder upon you in place of the "Royal," it is because of the greater profit upon it. This of itself is evidence of the superiority of the "Royal." To give greater profit the other must be a lower cost powder, and to cost less it must be made with cheaper and inferior materials, and thus, though selling for the same, give less value to the consumer.

To insure the finest cake, the most wholesome food, be sure that no substitute for Royal Baking Powder is accepted by you.

Nothing can be substituted for the Royal Baking Powder and give as good results.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

She lived with her father in a roomy broad beamed, brown old house, environed by elm trees taller, but less antique, than itself. It was an American Eighteenth century house. Some hero of the Revolution had passed a night in it. It stood on the side of a low, gradual hill, and was four miles away from the nearest railway station. Altogether the region was sufficiently remote, though New York city was hardly more than three hours distant by rail. The mail arrived twice a day, and Mr. Alexander Randolph, the owner of the house and estate, received yesterday's World every forenoon, and read it during the hour preceding dinner, which always took place at 2 o'clock. It was an eminently conservative household; at all events its master was a conservative and a democrat, as his fathers had been before him.

These forefathers were of Virginian descent, and two generations ago had owned large plantations in the south. But the young Randolph of that epoch had fallen in love with a northern lady, and ended by marrying her and settling down on this estate, which was his bride's dowry.

He was originally quite wealthy, but lost money by speculations during the war. With intent to compel a better fortune he soon after ran for an office, but was defeated, as a foregone conclusion, by a crushing majority. To crown all he lost his wife, to whom he was devotedly attached. She died of typhoid fever in 1863. He was left with two children, a boy of 10 and a girl of 6. Mr. Randolph, though of a haughty and headstrong character, was not what is called thorough. He was tall and of slender build, with high shoulders, a gray mustache and imperial, and thick, wavy hair, growing rather long. His eyebrows were bushy and overhanging and gave to his eyes a fiercer expression than might otherwise have belonged to them; he had a habit of twisting them between his thumb and finger when in thought, which looked ominous to strangers, but really amounted to nothing. His fingers were very long, and so were his arguments and discussions; almost the only short thing about him, in fact, being his temper. His general aspect was that of a retired southern brigadier whose slaves had been unrighteously made contraband. His expression was, ordinarily, profoundly serious, and he smiled rarely; but it was not difficult to make him break into a shrill, giggling laugh, which absurdly marred the severe contour of his visage and betrayed the underlying weakness.

He was fond of phrases, and had a fancy for calling himself "the most indulgent of fathers," but whenever his children transgressed the moral law of their father's good humor or indolence—and this was not seldom the case with Ed, who was as restless and independent as a hawk—he fell upon them with sweeping broadsides of rebuke, culminating, if they answered him back, in violent assertions of their total depravity. Ed was sent to school, but the study of books had no part in his scheme of existence. In the boy's seventeenth year Hamilton Jocelyn, a friend of the family, being on a visit of a few days to the Randolphs, was tickled by Ed's bearing and the story of his exploits, and offered to take him back with him to New York city for a month or so, to give him instruction in the laws and amenities of polite society.

He went off accordingly, and the month had prolonged itself to six before he came back. His father thought that he had been improved by his sojourn there. He had brought back with him certainly a great deal of entertaining talk, and gave Beatrix endless accounts of the great city, its streets, its houses, its horses, its theatres; above all, of its operas and its concerts. Both she and Ed had always been passionately devoted to music. They had understood it, by the light of nature, as it were, from a very early age, and had constantly practiced ever since. Ed's voice was not of much use, but he was an admirable performer on the violin. Beatrix, on the other hand, was above all things a singer, and her voice developed into a soprano of remarkable range and power. Her studies were not confined to church music. She knew by heart all the great operas and oratorios, and in pursuance of the marked dramatic ability which she possessed she had, with Ed's assistance, acted out scenes from many of the former (so far as two performers might) on the stage of the back drawing room.

One day Hamilton Jocelyn, who had heard all the famous singers of the world in his time, attended one of these private entertainments. Contrary to expectation he turned out to be the most eulogistic auditor that Beatrix had ever had, and he wound up his praises by declaring that she must be provided with a master to bring her voice out. The most indulgent of fathers was gratified by this tribute of admiration from such a source to his favorite child, and a week or so afterward the master was sent for.

This was an elderly Englishman of respectable antecedents, who, twenty years before, had begun his musical career with what was considered the finest tenor voice of the age, and whose knowledge of the principles of music was as profound as his proficiency was remarkable. But before he had been a year on the operatic stage the theatre in which he was singing caught fire, and he was burned about the throat in such a way as forever to destroy the voice which would have made him rich and famous enough to satisfy ambition itself. Professor Dorimar, as he afterward came to be called, had some small private means which rendered him in a humble way independent, and with a philosophical serenity which rarely characterizes the musical temperament he settled quietly down to be a writer on the art and science of whose highest triumphs he could never more hope to partake. For the last eight years he had lived in New York, but he was known to very few. He sat with his piano and his manuscripts, and his visions of divine harmonies, in a retired little room a few blocks west of Washington square, and seldom went forth save to listen for half an hour to one or other of the very few singers who in his judgment were great enough to sing. He never was known to have undertaken the personal instruction of pupils, though he might undoubtedly have derived a large income from so doing. But he was of opinion that the right to use the voice in music is given to but two or three in an age, and the chance that the training of one so gifted should fall to him was too remote to be considered. To the myriad chances of failure he preferred his comparative poverty and his peace of mind.

What arguments Jocelyn employed to woo him from his reserve cannot be known. But Mr. Randolph received a note from the professor, mentioning the day and hour of his arrival, and requesting Mr. Randolph to meet him and drive him up from the railway station alone. This was done, and on the way the professor stipulated that he should be enabled to hear Miss Randolph's voice before she was aware of his presence. "There is a train back to the city this evening, sir," he remarked, "and, if I should conclude to take it, it would be well to have spared the young lady the annoyance of an interview." The matter was readily managed. Beatrix sang with the unembarrassed freedom of supposed solitude, and the Professor listened. When the young lady had finished her selection, whatever it was, she rose from the piano and passed out through the open window of the room to the veranda. Here she was surprised by the appearance of a meager and pallid personage, of gentlemanly bearing and aspect, with a broad scar on the right side of his face and throat, and many thoughtful lines and wrinkles on his brow and around his eyes, who advanced toward her with a bow and took her hand. As she looked at him she fancied there were tears in his eyes. "Miss Randolph," he said, in a low and very pleasant voice, "I am to have the honor of being your instructor; my name is Dorimar." He said no more at that time, but raised her soft fingers to his lips, and with another bow disappeared. He did not take the evening train back to the city, but on the contrary took up his abode in the Randolphs' house, and being, in addition to his musical attainments, a man of cultivation, and of a singular naive charm of character, he was nearly as much of an acquisition to Mr. Randolph as to his daughter, and they all became very good friends. As to his teaching, it was a matter between his pupil and himself, and was not often referred to outside. It seemed to afford him especial pleasure to think that Beatrix was singing for music's sake, and without any purpose of publishing or profiting by her acquirements. "Music is a sacred thing, my child," he would often say to her, "and like all sacred things it is shamefully and almost universally desecrated. It is not a mere question of voice and ear, but of purity and loftiness of soul. Great music never was greatly sung by a charlatan, or a libertine, or a fortune hunter. I, for my part, thank God that you are what you are, and that you will never be obliged to weigh your music against gold. The world may listen to you if it can, but you shall be spared the insult of receiving for it what it dares to call recompense!"

Beatrice acquiesced in all this wisdom, but somewhere in her secret soul she may have cherished the germ of an ambition to meet great multitudes of her fellow creatures, to test herself upon them, perhaps to delight and inspire them, if there were power in her so to do. Three years passed, and then Ed went to Europe. There was some pretext about his attending lectures at a university of mining engineering in Saxony, but it was a tolerably transparent pretext. That he should come back at the end of two or three years somewhat toned down was the best Mr. Randolph hoped. As to the question of funds, after a good deal of meditation Mr. Randolph came to the following rather eccentric determination: Ed was to be allowed to draw on the paternal resources for whatever sums of money he from time to time might require. "You may draw little or you may draw much, my son," the old gentleman said, "and, be it much or little, all your drafts will be duly honored. I shall not restrict you nor advise you, but I shall depend upon your own sense of honor and decency, as a Randolph and a gentleman, not to abuse my confidence in you." This speech seemed to the utterer of it very noble and impressive, and also very sagacious and worldly wise. For if to put a young fellow upon his honor will not make him reasonably virtuous and economical what will? Ed certainly showed himself pleased with the arrangement, if not so much impressed by the phrase in which it was announced to him. He was an enterprising and able youth, and probably expected to make a fortune of his own rather than spend his father's.

The next thing that occurred in this eventful year was an offer of marriage, emanating from no less distinguished a personage than Hamilton Jocelyn himself. Beatrix thought it was exceedingly funny he should do such a thing, and not altogether comfortable; but as it was instinctive with her to consider other people's feelings almost as much as her own, and sometimes more, she suppressed her emotions and expressed her acknowledgments, adding that she had no idea of marrying anybody. When Jocelyn found that her resolve was not to be shaken he very gracefully said that to have known and loved her was a privilege and a revelation for which he should never cease to be indebted to her. He said that he had perhaps presumed too much in hoping that she could ever care for a grizzled old fellow like himself, but that his sentiments would never change, and that if, at any future time, circumstances should lead her to reconsider her present views, she would find him eager and grateful to throw himself at her feet. He concluded by requesting that she would forbear to mention the episode to any one, even to her father, lest the latter should be grieved to discover that she could not bring herself to consent to an alliance with his oldest friend. Beatrix replied that she had no wish to speak of what had occurred, and that she hoped they both would forget it as soon as possible. Hereupon Jocelyn took his leave, and went back to New York, probably regretting the issue of the adventure almost as much as he professed to do, although perhaps for reasons other than those he thought it expedient to allege.

The third event was the death of poor Professor Dorimar, which occurred suddenly and filled Beatrix with grief, notwithstanding that it appeared in one sense the most natural thing that could have happened to the good and magnanimous old man. He had had a habit of looking upward as he talked, and Beatrix had thought that he seemed much of the time communing with a better world, and perhaps derived from some angelic source his grand ideas about music and its mission to mankind. It was the first death the girl had ever witnessed, and it invested the three years of the association together of the pupil and her master with a sort of retrospective sanctity. They had been altogether the happiest years of Beatrix's life. The professor had taught her something else besides how to sing. Less by words than by some tacit, sympathetic influence he had led her to perceive and meditate upon the nobler and loftier aspects and capacities of human nature. As to his share in her vocal culture and her own proficiency he never had made any definite pronouncement; but on the morning before his death he requested her to sing for him the air from Handel's oratorio of "The Messiah"—"I know that my Redeemer liveth." When she had finished he said: "My child, you have enabled me to thank God that my voice was destroyed, and that my life has been for so many years a lonely disappointment. I have had triumphs and blessings that most men do not even know how to desire. A mighty scepter is in your hand," he went on, turning his grave and gentle eyes upon her. "I have helped to show you how to wield it. Power is very sweet, but it needs almost an angel not to use it harmfully. I don't know what life may be before you, my dear; but whatever it may be I trust that when you come to the end of it you will find as little cause to regret having met me as I have much cause to rejoice that I have known you." Beatrix hardly knew how to understand this at the time, but afterward the words frequently revisited her memory, and may have had some influence over her at critical moments of her career.

Islands Sold to a Syndicate.

The Isles of Shoals, eight miles off Portsmouth, N. H., have been sold to a Boston syndicate. The price, which is $550,000 for islands and the hotel buildings, has been guaranteed, and the transfer will be immediately made in order that contemplated improvements may be completed for next season's business. C. D. Wainwright, banker, of Boston, has managed the deal, which will result, as soon as necessary preliminaries are perfected, in the transfer of the entire interest of the Messrs. Leighton. The purchase takes in every one of this group of islands—viz., Appledore, Smutty Nose, Cedar, Duck and Malaga within the Maine boundary, and Star, White, Londoner's and Seavey's in the New Hampshire division. The sale is without reservation.

One of the new features for both Appledore and Star islands is to be the introduction of electricity as a potent factor, and an electric railway is to encircle both isles. Appledore is 3½ miles around, and the railway around this island will connect with one around both Star and Smutty Nose, distance 3½ miles, making the total distance seven miles. The motive power plant is to be on Appledore and through cables. By this plant both the isles are to be finely lighted.—Manchester (N. H.) Union.

The Glory of Nancy Hanks.

An evening contemporary finds "relief to the vulgarity of the announcement that Nancy Hanks has out trotted all the trotters of the land" in the fact that the mare "is owned now by a Boston man who is not responsible for her name." It is hard to see where "vulgarity" enters into the announcement of the great achievement of the mare. The original Nancy Hanks was a brave and good woman, and the mother of a president. Her memory is revived by the speed of a good and brave mare. A good woman is the noblest of all creatures, and next to her, in the estimation of thousands, is a good horse.

If the namesake of the western woman were condemned to the dreary circle of a brickyard or controlled in her motions by the bell of a horse car, then would there be the vulgarity that approaches ignominy, but to be thus honored in the history of trotting is a glory that is not enhanced even by Boston ownership.—Boston Journal.

No Perfect Figures in Chicago.

It is reported that one of the artists on the exhibition buildings is in a quandary. He wishes to paint the figure of a (physically) perfect human being on one of the ceilings and cannot find a model. But why should he want one? He will not discover perfection in humanity, and if he has in his mind's eye the ideal of the perfection he wishes to represent he ought to be able to delineate it "al fresco." That is what the artists of the world and their admirers have called "creation," to distinguish it from the more servile work of merely copying what is set before them. This particular artist may be justified by the code of the profession, and yet it may be regarded as a pity that he cannot rise above the recognized necessity and dispense with the menial pose.—Chicago Tribune.

National Manners A-traveling.

It is curious to watch on board a steamer how the men of different nationalities behave to a lady no longer young who is traveling alone. The Frenchman is absolutely rude if he gets the chance; the German simply takes no notice; the Austrian is frigidly polite; the Englishman takes trouble to be kind if his aid is solicited; the American is kind from habit and without effort; the British colonist attentive, because women of any kind are scarce in his country.—Pall Mall Budget.

The Instinct Remains.

Rapacious birds and beasts retain their love of destroying even after years of confinement, and it is a well acknowledged fact that among these rapacious animals of a menagerie which are reared in confinement we find the most ferocious and destructive examples if they once escape and become aware of their power.—Science.

Rapid Firing.

The Gatling gun is now worked by an electric motor in the American navy. The motor is attached to the breech of the gun. Hitherto a couple of men were required to serve the gun, one to train the piece and drop the shot, the other to work the firing crank; but now one man is sufficient. By touching a switch he can train and operate the gun at will, so as to fire either a single shot or at the rate of 1,200 a minute.—Yankee Blade.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO HIMSELF.

The most inhuman outrages, outrages which would disgrace the savage, man perpetrates upon his own system by swallowing drastic purgatives which convulse his stomach, agonize his intestines and weaken his system. Many people constantly do this under the impression that medicaments only which are violent in their action, and particularly cathartics, are of any avail. Irreparable injury to health is wrought under this mistaken idea. The laxative which most nearly approaches the beneficient action of nature is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which is painless but thorough, and invigorates the intestinal canal instead of weakening and irritating it. The liver and the stomach share in the benign discipline instituted by this comprehensive medicine, whose healthful influence is felt throughout the system. Malarious, rheumatic, kidney and nervous complaints succumb to it.

AN AMERICAN STONEHENGE.

Far up on these abandoned mountain farms
Now drifting back to forest wilds again,
The long, gray walls extend their clasping arms,
Pathetic monuments of vanished men.

Serpents in stone, they wind o'er hill and dell
'Mid orchards long deserted, fields unshorn;
The crumbling fragments resting where they fell,
Forgotten, worthless to a race newborn.

Nearer than stones of storied Saxon name
These speechless relics to our hearts should come.
No toiler for a priest's or monarch's fame,
This farmer lived and died to shape a home.

What days of lonely toil he undertook!
What years of iron labor; and for what?
To yield the chipmunk one more secret nook,
The gliding snake one more sequestered spot.

So little time on earth; so much to do;
Yet all that waste of weary, toilworn hands!
Life came and went; the patient task is through,
The men are gone; the idle structure stands.
—T. W. Higginson in New England Magazine.

THE BOGY MAN.

In 1715 a small slave schooner from the coast of Africa, bound for Virginia, was blown far out of her course, toward the north, and put in at the port of Boston.

The cargo consisted of little else than a few families of Congo negroes destined for the new plantations of Virginia.

New Englanders did not then feel any special abhorrence to slavery. If not regarded with positive favor it was not regarded with disfavor, and the slavers found little difficulty in disposing of his cargo of men, women and children to the good citizens of Massachusetts bay.

Among the purchasers was Mr. Lemuel Clark, owner of a large tract of land on the Merrimac river, in New Hampshire. Three families of negroes were bought by him and taken to his estate in the wilderness.

Once the tenant of an English baronial estate himself, he inclined to play the baron on his New Hampshire domain. A great stockade was built upon the eminence overlooking the Merrimac, and within the stockade, upon the crown of the hill, stood his large log house. Lower down, but within the stockade, were three cabins of the slave families and the more pretentious houses of the families of English laborers who accompanied Mr. Clark to the New World. Back from the stockade and stretching to the foot of some cliffs that formed the abutment of a range of low hills was a wide expanse of level, cleared land, on which the estate raised its corn and potatoes.

Beyond the few charred stumps that marked the edge of the clearing was the forest stretching away as far as the eye could reach.

As the Merrimac was one of the highways of marauding French and Indians, the stockade was very strongly built, and from embrasures in its walls projected three small brass cannon commanding the sweep of the river in every direction. No fleet of canoes could safely pass the stockade by day. The importance of the place was so well recognized that Mr. Clark held a colonial commission as major and the stockade was officially styled Fort Clark.

The children of the fort made no distinction between white and black. The little Clarks, Sanborns, Tennys and Marsdens played with the little Quashees, Cushees and Gambas upon terms of perfect equality.

The children of both races whisked from house to house. About the hearths of the negroes the little Englishmen listened with fascinated horror to wild tales of devils and evil spirits, great serpents, huge river monsters and the gigantic manlike apes of the mysterious continent of Africa; of bloody tribal wars and human sacrifices to the heathen gods. The little black boys learned of the gay elves and gnomes, of dainty sprites and fays of merry England, of the good cheer of Christmas and the sports of May Day. The rival story tellers strove to outdo each other in the marvelous tales; but nothing so pleased the children of both races as Sam Quashee's stories of the Mumbo Jumbo, for in his native village Sam himself had been Mumbo Jumbo.

The big Congo negro enjoyed telling how when a crime had been committed by some person unknown, Mumbo Jumbo was called upon to detect the guilty one, and how, mounted upon stilts, with a long grass cloak completely enshrouding him, a great false head fastened above his own head and a pair of wooden arms sticking out below it, he stalked about the village like a giant terrifying the guilty one until he confessed his crime.

The children delighted to hear of the Mumbo Jumbo marching up and down the paths of the African village, crowds of people dancing about him, beating on tomtoms and singing wild chants. And when Cushee and Gamba gave the battle yell of the cannibal tribe—for those were cannibal families—the satisfaction was complete.

Of the tales of the English merrymaking, none pleased the little Africans so much as Philip Sanborn's descriptions of the May Day sports. The jollity of Christmas they knew, for Lemuel Clark was not a Puritan and kept the Christmas holidays, but they wished to dance about a May pole crowned with flowers. One Christmas night, as all the people of the fort were gathered in the big common room of the "great house," Mr. Clark promised that the approaching May Day should be celebrated in English style. Philip Sanborn was told to take the matter in hand and make any preparations he wished. Philip Sanborn was pleased, but seeing a cloud upon the face of his rival story teller, Sam Quashee, he asked if the negro families might not have the afternoon of May Day for showing their native games and sports.

The request was readily granted, and on the next day Sam Quashee dragged to his cabin two well seasoned pine logs that had been left after building the stockade, and for weeks thereafter employed every evening in carving from the logs mysterious objects which even his own children were not allowed to see.

The winter of 1722 melted into an early spring in New Hampshire. The rivers were free from ice in April, and the first canoes that came up the Merrimac brought the news that war was declared with France. The weapons and defenses were duly looked to, but no precautions were taken, for it was a long month's journey through the wilderness to Canada; besides it was not likely the enemy would move at once.

May Day came at last and a tall Maypole decorated with wreaths of flowers and stripes of colored cloth stood in the broad stretch of greensward before the gate of the stockade. Around this pole the children danced and played old English games. A bountiful outdoor repast called the merrymakers from their fun. Hastily eating what was placed before them, the older negroes left the others at the feast. Going across the clearing they disappeared among the heaps of rocks at the foot of the craggy hills. All the mysterious things Sam Quashee had been laboring upon for the past months evidently were hidden in the cliffs. The children impatiently awaited the advent of the weird procession whose grotesque strangeness would cause them that delightful terror all children enjoy.

An hour passed, but as yet there were no signs of life about the heaps of rocks. The delay was unaccountable. Sam Quashee's oldest boy, Bob, proposed that they start across the fields to meet the delayed procession. The other children eagerly agreed, and off they all started.

Picking their way over the soft plowed land, they went toward the hills, all the time on the alert, expecting to turn and flee at any moment before the approach of the Mumbo Jumbo.

"Why, they are not at the cliffs at all,' said Mary Clark when the children had reached the middle of the clearing. "Look over the edge of pines."

Sure enough, they could see dark figures among the burned trees at the border of the forest hastily concealing themselves from the gaze of the little crowd so suddenly turned upon them.

"I saw 'em!" cried Luke Sanborn. "One of 'em had a feather hat on. I could see it just as plain, but I didn't see anybody on stilts with a false face. Let's go over."

"It's too far away to see any stilts or false faces and we had better stay here,' said Patience Tenney, the oldest of the group.

Just at that moment there sounded from the fort the harsh blare of the trumpet used to call the laborers from the fields at mealtime. Looking back the children saw a sudden flash of flame, and a deep roar of a cannon reverberated among the hills. The next instant the crackle of musketry came faintly from the Merrimac; it was answered from the fort; a blood curdling war whoop burst from the edge of the clearing near them and three Indian warriors raised from among the stumps and came leaping toward them!

Almost before they could turn toward the fort loud drum peals sounded from the rocks at the foot of the hills. As if in reply to the war whoops there rang forth the wild, savage, African battle cry. There stalked forth into the clearing two immense, hideous giants, accompanied by four strangely bedecked creatures beating on tomtoms and screaming forth the battle cry of the Ansgari cannibals. Fearful, huge, red, distorted gashes of mouths, knobby, black cheeks, terribly staring white eyes, altogether diabolical faces had these two giants, stalking stiffly out of the clearing. Scarcely less terrifying were the bepainted creatures with moose horns rising above their heads, who leaped and danced along before the giants.

Away, with loud shrieks, the children rushed toward the fort. The Indians halted amazed. The giants and their attendants halted too. They had just discovered the Indians. They had thought the firing of the cannon a salute in honor of the day.

The Indians hesitated, and the Mumbo Jumbos hesitated.

But one cannot stand still on stilts. The tallest of the Mumbo Jumbos staggered forward and one of the Indians turned and fled. The other giant advanced, the attendants struck their drums again, and again the horrid Ansgari war song pealed forth, and the second Indian followed the first. The third Indian dropped on one knee, and before the Mumbo Jumbos could turn he drew a bead and sent a bullet crashing through the wooden forehead of Sam Quashee's mask.

The giant neither fell nor faltered, and with a cry of terror the last Indian rushed after his companions down the river edge.

Slowly, as befitting their brave conquests and the softness of the ground, the procession of Mumbo Jumbos passed across the field and through the gate of the fort where the children had just preceded them. The idols of Africa had overcome the redskins. The rising generation of Clarks, Tennys, Sanborns and Marsdens would never doubt that fact.

Meantime the white coated body of a French officer went floating down the river, and two canoes rapidly disappeared up the river. The attack upon Fort Clark had been repulsed. The war with France had begun.—Atlanta Constitution.

What Good Clothes Are For.

The chief inducement urged in an invitation to make one of a woman's camping party in the month of August is the assurance: "You can wear one dress all day long every day until it is dirty. That's what we all did last year." Then the note adds: "Be sure and tell me right away how to have my mousseline de soie made. Mrs. R.'s husband and a lot of the girls' brothers are going up for a week. You'd better take something captivating for the dance in the old barn, and one or two pretty day rigs, but you won't need them till the boys get there."—New York Times.

CHINESE AT HOME

A Great Many of Their Customs are Just the Opposite of ours.

THEIR SIMILARITY TO JAPANESE.

No Hereditary Aristocracy in China—The People Vary in the Different Sections.

The samples we get of China in our country give us very inadequate ideas of the people. We have here to contemplate a civilization entirely unlike our own, but in itself much more complete than ours. In the presence of the Chinese, all Europeans and Americans are parvenus. These people burned coal before the Christian era. They invented printing 1,000 years before Gutenberg and Faust flourished, and they knew the use of gunpowder when our forefathers were using bows and arrows. In most things which appear on the surface they are our antipodes. They mount a horse from the right side instead of the left, read from left to right, say west south instead of southwest, their mariner's needle points to the south, the men wear petticoats and the women trousers, they shave the fronts of their heads and not their faces, shake their own hands instead of each others as a greeting, write their family names first and their given names afterward, have their marginal notes at the top of their books, place a distinguished guest on the left and are careful not to uncover in his presence, wear white for mourning, the men sew and the women work in the fields, and so on to the end of the chapter.

We shall find in China the origin of much that we have seen in Japan. The position of woman in the family and society is about the same, except that the Japanese women do not cramp their feet, and therefore can go about more freely. The domestic architecture is similar, so far as external construction goes, but the Chinese houses have no mats, and the people do not squat on the floor. Both wear loose, flowing robes, which the Chinese button, but the Japanese do not. In the conversation of the people the Chinese indulge in honorifics as much as the Japanese. It is the correct thing to ask your friend to condescend to come from his elegant house to your miserable hovel, or to allow his distinguished cup of tea to descend to your unworthy self. The Chinese classics are also the classics in Japan, and the Chinese ideographs are used by Japanese writers. Education is mainly etiquette. The Chinese have 3,000 rules of behavior, which the educated man must know. If a man have bad manners, they say he is not educated.

The Chinese sages, like Confucius, Mencius and others whose works are classics, enunciated a high grade of ethics. Confucius stated the golden rule, though negatively, thus: "If there is anything I do not want done to me, I will not do it unto another." His ethical teachings take rank with those of the Greek and Roman moralists and the Hebrew prophets, but are without reference to a Supreme Being who requires us to keep his commandments. The family customs are similar to the Japanese. Society is patriarchal. The family, not the individual, is considered. Marriages are arranged as in Japan to perpetuate the family, and go betweens are employed to settle the terms. There is only one wife, but concubines are taken into the house at will. The wife finds life burdensome when she is the servant of the household, especially of her father-in-law and mother-in-law, but when she becomes a mother-in-law she gets her own innings and makes it warm for her daughter-in-law.

The Chinese have as many genuflexions as the Japanese and numerous grades of obeisances to be employed according to circumstances. Three prostrations, each with three knockings of the head against the floor, are supposed to be about the extreme exhibition of respect. The people vary a good deal in the different sections. The south of China is mountainous, and the people there are smaller, more volatile and brighter than in the north, where the crowded dwellers on the plains and paddy fields are heavier, less excitable, not so quick to see or act. There is no hereditary aristocracy in China. All the people are bound to obey the will of the emperor and have no rights he is bound to respect. There is no caste, as in India. The people are classified as natives and aliens, the latter being subdued people in the provinces; conquerors and conquered, with special reference to the prohibition of marriages between the Mantchoo and Chinese, and freemen and slaves. There are no laws against slavery. Every native is allowed to purchase slaves and retain their children in servitude, but the number of slaves is small, and their condition is comparatively easy. Probably there are no better mannered people in the world than the educated Chinese. They are also very competent business men, and as such enjoy an excellent reputation.—Cor. Boston Herald.

Lost.

The notices tacked to fences and tree trunks in rural neighborhoods are sometimes amusing specimens of composition. The writer saw the following tacked to a tree one day last summer. It was written in blue ink on a piece of brown wrapping paper:

SATURN'S FAMOUS RINGS.

A Phenomenon Unlike Anything Else In the Whole Solar System.

Every one who has given the least attention possible to astronomical curios knows that Saturn presents a phenomenon to which there is nothing analogous in the whole of the solar system—two broad, flat and very thin rings being his constant attendants in his trips around the sun. Galileo first noticed a peculiarity in the appearance of this ringed planet, which he said "appeared like a large body placed between two smaller ones." Huygens first described the rings and figured them for the benefit of those not fortunate enough to own a telescope.

The breadth of these rings from the outer diameter of the larger to the inner edge of the smaller has been computed at 29,900 miles; total diameter of the outer ring, 167,000 miles, and a space of 10,000 miles is supposed to intervene between the inner edge of the small ring and the surface of the planet itself.

The composition of these rings, or, rather, this system of rings—some authors mention three and even four, although I have mentioned but two in the opening, which seems to be the number accorded by the majority of writers—is simply a matter of conjecture. Some astronomers claim that they are composed of material similar to that of the planet itself, while others are sure that "they are composed of numerous satellites (moons) mingled with vaporous matter traveling in planes."

Maxwell says, "The rings must be formed of separate particles moving around the planet as independent satellites." According to Otto Struve, observations on the rings for a period over 200 years prove beyond a doubt that they are widening, and that the lower edge of the inner one is slowly but certainly approaching the body of the planet.—St. Louis Republic.

Reading Shakespeare.

If Mr. Dana would sound the tocsin and tell men and women of all grades of life what pleasure and profit they might secure by reading Shakespeare's plays, he would be a benefactor to his race.—M. P. H. in The Tribune.

Things that are better than pleasure, more valuable than profit, they might thus secure. The soul would be illuminated, the intellect broadened, the spiritual nature exalted, the affections refined, the life dignified, the whole of the cherishable powers of manhood or womanhood inspired and augmented. The influence of Shakespeare's genius is ennobling. It pervadeth one and compasseth all; it dealeth with the visible world and the invisible, the right and the wrong, the craft and the stuff, the passions and the reason, the images of form and their shadows, the beautiful and the hateful, the specters, the chimeras and whatever else there be in space, time or fancy. We tell all men and women that there is no other one like unto Shakespeare. When he entereth the mind and taketh possession of the heart, there can be no place in the thought or in the habit for aught that is mean.—Charles A. Dana.

Russian Etiquette.

If you invite a Russian to dinner, make a point of offering him before he takes his seat at the table certain hors d'œuvres, and above all do not forget to accompany these with a dram of spirits. The stronger the latter the higher the Russian guest will esteem his entertainer, who must pour the cognac out himself, not into a liquor glass, but into a bordeaux glass, and it is indispensable that he should drain the entire bumper to the health of his guest before the latter has time to put his glass to his lips. Each time you make a speech at dinner, or at any repast, be careful to have your glass filled to the brim before you begin speaking, and the moment you have concluded your remarks drain your glass to the very last drop at a gulp, since that if the slightest heeltap remains it means in the eyes of the Russians that your remarks have been insincere.—Petite Republique Francaise.

The Irish Woman at the Bank.

An old woman of undeniable Celtic origin entered a down town savings bank the other day and walked up to the desk.

"Do you want to draw or deposit?" asked the gentlemanly clerk.

"Naw, Oi doan't. Oi want ter put some in," was the reply.

The clerk pushed up the book for her signature, and indicating the place said, "Sign on this line, please."

"Above it or below it?"

"Yes."

"Before Oi was married?"

"No, just as it is now."

"Oi can't write."—Boston Transcript.

Khirgese Prefer the Moslem Faith.

Our Odessa correspondent says that the Russian orthodox missionaries have so failed in their proselytizing efforts among the Khirgese that the missions will probably be shortly withdrawn. Nearly the whole of the steppe tribes, generally described as "heathens," are now adopting, almost "en masse," the Mohammedan faith, which is spread among them chiefly by Tartar teachers. The Mohammedan Tartars have always enjoyed the right of free proselytism among the natives of the Khirgese steppes.—London News.

TO MAKE SALADS.

Some Very Valuable Hints for the Housekeeper's Benefit.

THE MANY DIFFERENT METHODS.

Lettuce Makes an Excellent Foundation for Several Kinds of Salads—Game and Fish.

In warm weather, if there is any dish which will tempt a wavering appetite it is certainly a well made, prettily decorated, ice cold salad. It requires art to make a good salad. Perhaps genius is necessary to the preparation of a perfect one. Sidney Smith prided himself upon the excellence of his salads, and wrote a rhymed recipe for the mayonnaise. But many a little housewife has the requisite qualities to enable her to make nice salads without any assistance save her own keen sense of taste, quick perception and excellent judgment. Fortunately it is not often necessary to go into a hot kitchen to prepare a salad, as it may so frequently be made of left overs from the table or vegetables fresh from the garden or refrigerators. The materials used in salads are numerous and should always be of the best.

Lettuce is so pliant, having no antipathies and not a trace of self assertion, that it readily incorporates with its own mild flavor any taste or smell that may be added, and therefore furnishes a most desirable basis for a salad. Its crisp, fresh, golden green appearance, especially when fringed and curled, commends it to the eye as much as its faintly delicate flavor does to the palate. I know a gentleman who with shrimps and lettuce makes an ideal dish for a summer evening tea.

Nasturtium salad should be made of white heads of lettuce dressed with picked nasturtium, oil and lemon juice. If served in a delicate glass dish and decorated with nasturtium blossoms the salad is appetizing and beautiful. Green bean pods, gathered before the beans form, boiled in salt water until tender, then chilled and covered with a mayonnaise which contains a mere suggestion of onion juice, will be found quite acceptable. Cold cauliflower dressed with a cream sauce and ornamented with chopped olives and capers may be served as a salad. If oil is not desired melted butter may be used. Garnish with thin slices of cucumber or a green pea salad. It may be served with a regular mayonnaise dressing.

Tomato salad may be made in a variety of ways. The easiest way is to dress with cayenne pepper, oil and lemon. Either the red or yellow tomato is pretty enough without decoration. So also are beets, one of the handsomest products of the garden. An excellent plain salad is made of hot sliced beets cooked for a while in a little water, vinegar and sugar. Make a red sauce of the water by thickening with cornstarch and add butter, and pour over the beets. It may be served hot or cold.

Small green cucumbers furnish material for an excellent salad. It is little wonder that this vegetable was one regretted by the Israelites in the desert. Egyptian cucumbers are said to be especially fine. Some of our varieties are much more delicious than others, but most of them are good if picked from the vines with the dew still upon them. Cucumbers should always be served ice cold. It is a great mistake to let them stand, as so many do, in salt water, as this destroys the crispness. Add a little onion juice and good vinegar, season with salt and pepper, and serve garnished with broken pieces of ice.

Celery cut up in small pieces, covered with a good mayonnaise and garnished with its own pretty leaves, makes a fine salad. It is invaluable in combination with various kinds of meat salads.

Though the cabbage is a plebeian vegetable, yet its gastronomic capabilities are numerous. Shakespeare alludes to it by its old name, "Worts! good cabbage." When the head is compact, white and crisp, it may be sliced very fine, salted and served with a dressing made of sour cream, whipped to a foam, and containing a little bit of vinegar. If the sour cream is not thick or yellow enough add the well beaten yolk of one egg. This is also an excellent dressing for cold boiled potatoes cut in cubes and decorated with rings of white of egg.

Hard boiled eggs as a salad and garnished with lettuce and parsley make a pretty and appetizing dish. During the heated term it is sometimes desirable to serve meat in salad form. Chicken is the best material for this purpose, although veal will serve as a substitute. A good recipe is as follows: Cut the meat of two chickens into small pieces and an equal quantity of celery. Add two teaspoonfuls of chopped olives and the same of capers. Make mayonnaise of three yolks of eggs, adding drop by drop the olive oil, stirring to the consistency of cream, adding now and then lemon juice. Add salt and cayenne pepper to taste. Mold the chicken on a platter and pour over it mayonnaise. An alternate dressing may be made as follows: Yolks of two eggs, one teaspoonful of flour, one of butter, one of sugar, one of mustard, one of salt, one of cayenne pepper. Mix to a paste with vinegar. Add a cup of boiling water. Cook till thick. Cool and add four tablespoonfuls of butter.

Lobster, salmon, cove oyster, whitefish and ham may all be used as salad. Salmon requires chopped cucumber pickles. The oysters are best made with lettuce or celery. The ham can be used with either cabbage or celery.

As a relish for roast duck or game orange salad is good. Slice six oranges for eight persons. Grate the rind of one and add the juice of one lemon, three tablespoonfuls of salad oil or melted butter, a pinch of cayenne pepper, and pour over the oranges.

Several herbs may be advantageously used in making salads, such as cherril. A bottle of extract of celery and a bottle of spiced vinegar are convenient in salad making. The latter should be flavored with mint, parsley, celery seed, onions, cloves, pepper, nutmeg, salt and sugar. Many of the materials used in salads, such as cress, lettuce and celery, are quieting to the nerves, tend to induce sleep and are therefore healthful as well as appetizing.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Marriage Proposal Reform.

A suggestion is made for a legal reform which, while retaining breach of promise actions, would deprive them of all their ornamental trimmings in the shape of love letters and the other usual incidents of courtship. It is proposed that no promise of marriage should be held valid unless it is made in writing upon properly stamped paper. Young ladies might affix a sixpenny stamp to the letter in which the swain declares his affections and ask him to be so good as to cancel it with his autograph.—London Tit-Bits.

Coal Formations.

The opinion is now quite general among geologists that bituminous and anthracite coals were formed during the same period and under like conditions; that, though originally all bituminous, during the violent contortions and upheavals of the earth's crust at the close of the carboniferous age the bituminous coals involved in that disturbance were changed by heat and pressure and the consequent expulsion of volatile matter from bituminous and anthracite. The microscope reveals the vegetable nature of the substance and in some beds of cannel coal whole trees have been found with roots, branches, leaves and seeds complete and all converted into the same quality of coal as that by which they were surrounded. Structurally there is under every seam a stratum of what is known as fire clay, and this stratum contains in great abundance the fossil impressions of roots and stems and twigs, showing that it was once the soil where vegetation grew luxuriantly. It is common also to find fossil tree stems lying mashed flat between the layers of black slate which form the roof of coal mines, as well as the impression of leaves, nuts and seeds from living trees.—New York Sun.

Two Miles a Minute by Rail.

Engineers are always, like the great Alexander, seeking new worlds to conquer. F. B. Behr, associate of the Institute of Civil Engineers, finds steam locomotion on the surface of this planet too slow at a more or less dangerous maximum of 60 miles an hour, and he proposes to whirl the man of the twentieth century at the rate of two miles per minute. Under the title of "Lightning Express Railway Service" he publishes a full statement of his plans, with all the necessary technical details. The motive power proposed is electricity and the method that which is known as the Lartigue single rail system, which in a rudimentary form is now at work on a short line of nine miles and a half from Listowel to Ballybunion in Ireland and from Feurs to Panissieres in the department of the Loire, France.

There are many advantages claimed for this idea, including the absolute impossibility of a train leaving the metals, its cheapness of construction, as well as a speed that brings Edinburgh within three hours of London. The king of the Belgians has accepted the dedication of Mr. Behr's interesting little work.—London Telegraph.

Two Classes of Numskulls.

There are two classes of men about whom the public are actually tired of reading. One is the man who didn't know it was loaded. The other is the man who buys gold bricks. A case of the first sort has just occurred in one of the suburbs of New York city. Two young men were talking together at noon in the planing mill in which they worked. One of them found an old revolver and flourished it. He didn't know it was loaded, of course. But the next moment his companion was dead. An instance of the gold brick idiocy occurred at Lyons, Ia., where a wealthy farmer paid out $2,600 for a brick worth $8,000, and is, it goes without saying, out his $2,600. How men who live in this age can make such blunders passes comprehension. We advise them to subscribe for a newspaper and by close application to its columns save themselves the trouble of learning by experience.—Omaha World-Herald.

Pictures of Life In Old Egypt.

Among the most interesting of the photographs and drawings of the paintings and sculptures in the rock tombs of El-Kal, or Nekheb, as it was formerly called, are those which illustrate the daily life of the ancient Egyptians 3,000 B. C. and later. There you can see men hunting and fishing, making wine, harvesting corn, plowing and hoeing, cooking and so on. There are representations of funerals and merry makings, with dancing girls and musicians, boating on the Nile, etc. At least one picture shows that, contrary to the common belief, the Egyptians had some knowledge of perspective.—London Globe.

A Hopeless Case.

They met by chance in the waiting room of a railway station.

"My friend," began the man with the valise full of tracts, persuasively, "have you ever reflected on the shortness of life, the uncertainty of all things here below, and the fact that death is inevitable?"

"Have I?" replied the man in the shaggy overcoat cheerfully. "Well, I should reckon! I'm a life insuranee agent!"

"Ah—um—looks as if we were going to have more snow, doesn't it?" said the other, locking his valise again with a snap.—Chicago Tribune.

Expensive Wall Covering.

Register Gates of the land office tells a story of the most expensive wall paper he ever heard of. It was in a house in College street, Jackson, Tenn. One of the rooms was papered with land grants belonging to one of the volumes of the land grant office for western Tennessee. These papers had been lost since the war and represented more than $2,000,000 in value. These papers were carefully detached and preserved for future reference.—New York Herald.

ORCHID TEA.

A New Kind of Beverage Which Bids Fair to Become Very Popular.

PROPERTIES AND USES OF ORCHIDS.

The French Make a Tea out of the Leaves of a Beautiful and Also Expensive Plant.

One would not look to the Kew Bulletin for a hint upon French customs. But some who have been thinking themselves familiar with the ways of Gaul may be surprised to learn from that recondite periodical that a tea of orchid leaves has long been popular across the channel. There is record of it fifty years ago as a beverage fairly well established, and of late consumption has increased. The sagacious and enterprising people of this country are always glad to hear of something new for the tea table, and acquaintance with this boon should not be confined to the readers of the Kew Bulletin—a peculiarly estimable class, but limited.

The mere name of orchid tea has something lordly and impressive in its sound. We fancy a millionaire consigning plants worth their weight in gold to the housekeeper's room, there to be stewed and served up for royal guests. It seems a revival of the luxury of old Rome. Vitellius should have drunk orchid tea at his feasts. Cleopatra should have dissolved her pearl therein. It is a theme for the invective of those guileless moralists who denounce the unparalleled extravagance of the Upper Classes.

Looking more closely, however, we fail to see anything really wicked in the fashion of orchid tea. The article is genuine enough. It is not compounded of some homely weed which botanists alone identify as akin to the gorgeous Cattleyas and the stately Denrobes of the tropics. The orchid from which this tea is made is a member of one of the handsomest and most expensive families, the Angrœcum, and a very pretty member too. It grows in the forests of Bourbon and Mauritius, and the scientific know it as Angrœcum fragrans.

Probably the natives have been using it for ages. Incidentally we may remark that those who fear the extermination of the nobler orchids may find solace here. If a small species, occupying a very narrow area, of which flowers and leaves alike are eagerly stripped, can hold its own for generations, there is not much cause to dread that the most ruthless of collectors can do worse than retard for a little while the increase of more showy species which are quite as prolific.

The commercial virtue of Angrœcum fragrans lies in the strong perfume of its leaves. The genus is allied to vanilla—also an orchid of course—and in this instance the kinship displays itself. It is enough, we read, "to touch the fresh leaves for the fingers to remain impregnated with the aroma," which remains when the leaves are dried. The process is as simple as could be apparently. No heat is applied, no coloring matter. Describing samples at Kew, The Bulletin observes that they are unshriveled and as "flat as we should find them in any herbarium."

And the decoction is simple. You just lay the leaves and stalks in cold water, about one gramme to a teacup—more or less according to taste—close the vessel tight and boil for ten minutes. It may be sweetened. Milk and rum bring out the flavor of the vanilla more strongly. It is as good cold as hot, and may be warmed up without deterioration. Finally we are told that material enough for fifty cups is sold in Paris for two francs (fifty cents); 105 cups, five francs. It is called Fraham as in Mauritius.

The uses of orchids make an interesting theme for speculation. The list of those identified by European science is strangely brief at present. No large family of plants has so few members which serve a visible purpose, and if we regard the question proportionately this usefulness becomes far more striking. Not fewer than 10,000 species of orchids are known, among which only twenty at the outside are credited with any virtue besides beauty. Some people hold in truth that this is all-sufficient. The enthusiast who thanked God—prematurely—that "those fiends the hybridizers" could do nothing with orchids, would ask no other merit.

But a larger view may tempt one to suspect that flowers so conspicuous, so fitted in every way to draw attention, have more significance in nature's scheme. It is to be observed that Europe was not so much as acquainted by sight with any epiphytal orchid a hundred years ago. Sixty years ago one could count the species grown upon one's fingers. Has any savant, chemist or doctor made a study of these plants? We never heard of his labors. Out of 3,000 species or so in cultivation have so much as a score been analyzed?

It is suggestive to remark that the commonest of those which are found in the temperate zone—our field varieties of orchids—are highly esteemed from the Atlantic to the Pacific. More than that, the root of a North American species, one of the Habenaria, which proves to have very nearly the same constituents, was and is equally esteemed among the Indians. Our own forefathers reckoned orchis mascula as one of their most important drugs. We have forgotten it, but from Poland to the Bosphorus and again to the China seas it is still a panacea.

Those who have visited Constantinople do not forget the droning cry, "Saleep saleep!" which peddlers of that milky substance raise the whole day through. If, discarding the tropic species, we take those plants of which our forefathers learned the use during countless generations, the great orchid family holds its own with any of them. We have reason to believe that the natives of India, and more especially of Africa and tropical America, could tell our scientific men some properties of orchids which would astonish them. But no one asks. Perhaps he would not learn much if he did. There are so many ugly secrets in native medicine that the professors do not willingly communicate their lore.

Orchid tea is not accredited with vigorous properties of any kind. In Mauritius and Bourbon they esteem it as a digestive, and it is prescribed in diseases of the organs of respiration.—St. James Budget.

The Idea.

"Then you don't hate me, Laura, dear?"

"No, George, I like you well enough, but it would be ridiculous for me to marry you. You are the first man that has proposed to me!"—Chicago Tribune.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, JULY 6 1894

The national anniversary that has just passed should suggest some serious thoughts in the mind of every American citizen. For the first time in human history a people already advanced to a high degree of civilization began their national life the owners of almost a continent. No region of such vast extent and so profusely supplied with all the materials required by man was ever owned by one people. With resources so varied and so valuable, with such vast extent of fertile land and such variety of products; under laws of their own making, and with officers of their own choosing to execute those laws it would fully justify the hope that within less than one hundred years from the Independence of the United States, there would not be found within the borders of the great Republic a single trace of the poverty, hunger, dirt and wretchedness, that through all ages and in all lands have been the curse of governments, and the final ruin of so many mighty nations. With the firm establishment of the United States government, well might the wisest men confidently believe that the glorious dream of all ages had at last become a reality; that Freedom like a messenger from heaven had at last found a congenial home on earth, and that under her benign influence all the evils that had cursed mankind under tyrrany and oppression would be no more known among us forever. But it would appear that the fabric of no vision is more baseless than the dream of a great nation uncursed with dire poverty, and with all the evils born of poverty, ignorance, brutality, vice and crime. Within the lines of the United States to day there is not a State or Territory but the air within it rings with the cry of men driven desperate by the sense of injustice and oppression. The great bulk of human beings are not only contented, but cheerful and happy when supplied with even moderate store of the necessaries of life, plain wholesome food, garments such as comfort and decency require, and a home be it ever so humble. When great masses of men become turbulent and reckless it is proof positive that themselves, their wives and children are suffering for want of those necessaries; and just in proportion to their sufferings will become their actions when at last they become maddened by sense of wrong. The vast resources originally rightfully owned by the whole people of the United States have become the property of a few. Coal fields the most extensive in the world; deposits of iron ore of unexampled extent and richness; the grandest forests in the world. A few now own these valuable resources and dole them out to the rightful owners at prices fixed by the grabbers themselves. With the millions so acquired the makers of State and national laws are bought like cattle. Judges are put in office to torture laws into such shape as suit the rich. Governors and other executive officers are put where they can serve their masters. How is all this iniquity accomplished? Let us look around us and note the characters of the men to whom we entrust the selection of public officers. The slums of great cities are raked to pack conventions with men who are known to be professional criminals Driven by political bosses they control the conventions and nominate for the judgships and other important offices only such men as are acceptable to the monied interest. Republican newspapers are themselves showing up the shameless profligacy of the late convention at Sacramento. It is only necessary to allude to Judge De Haven. He is known as a Judge who could be depended upon to do justice between corporations and the people and he was rejected by the convention. Evils will continue and multiply as long as the pernicious system which makes such a thing possible is allowed to exist.

The present great strike will result in Government control of all railroad and telegraph lines.

ORIGIN OF YACHTING.

CHANGES IN THE CONSTRUCTION OF VESSELS IN 300 YEARS.

Evolution In the Popularity of the Sport. The First International Race Was Between English and Dutch Vessels. Charles II Among the Earliest Patrons.

The term "yacht" is derived from the Danish word "jaght," meaning a chase; hence yachting is the chasing of one vessel after another, and accordingly yachting and yacht racing are synonymous expressions.

A yacht is and always has been essentially a pleasure craft, but in the early days no yacht of any size existed. Thus we find a writer in 1706 referring to a yacht as "a small ship built for swiftness and pleasure rather than for merchandise or warlike service." History does not tell us where, when or under what circumstances yachts were first built, but it is certain they are of ancient origin and were only owned by royal persons and great nobles. The latter fact receives corroboration from an ancient but carefully compiled dictionary of singular words, where a yacht is described as "a pleasure craft of not more than 100 tons for the king's use."

The earliest mention of a yacht in this country was as far back as the Anglo-Saxon period, when King Athelstan received from the king of Norway a present of a magnificent state barge, rigged with purple sails and decorated with wrought gold. Queen Elizabeth, we know, frequently used a state barge, and so have successive sovereigns to this day. It is curious to relate, and goes far to show the primitive nature of our early resources, that while foreigners were able to build yachts their example was not followed in this country till 1588, when the first English yacht was constructed at Cowes and launched from that port.

But while 1588 may be fixed as the commencement of yacht building in England, it cannot be said that during the next half century much progress was made with the newly acquired industry. Indeed, had it not been for Charles II, it is probable that the trade would not have been established for some time to come. King Charles, however, was very fond of sailing, and the Dutch East India company, with the view of gaining royal favor, presented him with a small sloop rigged vessel. The advent of the foreign built vessel evidently stimulated native talent, as we find Evelyn, in his diary of Oct. 1, 1661, writing, "I sailed this morning with his majesty in one of his yachts or pleasure boats, vessels not known among us till the Dutch East India company presented that curious piece to the king." But the king was not only a yachtsman; he was also a designer, and drew the lines of the Jamie, a 35 tonner, built at Lambeth, and raced her against the Bezan, a small Dutch built vessel belonging to the Duke of York.

The course was from Greenwich to Gravesend and back and the prize £100, which was won by the Bezan. As the ships were designed and constructed in different countries the race may fairly claim to have possessed an international character, while from the fact that the royal owners steered their own boats it was clearly an amateur match. Unfortunately with the death of Charles II came another lull in the history of yachting, and it was not till early in the eighteenth century that any real revival took place. During this long interval, however, yachting had gradually become a more democratic amusement, and the sport of kings had descended to the level of commoners. Cork harbor became a favorite yachting ground and during the summer months was crowded with diminutive pleasure vessels. Indeed, so popular did the sport become that in 1720 the Cork Harbor Water club was formed to encourage yacht racing. The club ultimately developed into what is now the Royal Cork Yacht club. Here, then, we have the first authentic attempt at organization in the yachting world.

A few years later the sport came into favor in the south of England, and Maitland, in his "History of London" (1739), refers to sailing as one of the amusements to be met with on the river Thames, while later still (1801) Strutt, in his well known work on "Sports and Pastimes," mentions the existence of a society consisting of certain gentlemen who gave a silver cup to be sailed for annually in the vicinity of London. Toward the close of the eighteenth century Cowes became the favorite resort of yacht racing, but still the contending vessels were of small size, none being over 35 tons. It was not until the foundation of the yacht club, afterward the Royal Yacht club and now the world renowned Royal Yacht squadron, that yachting in this country may fairly be said to have established itself as a national sport, and even then (1812) the number of yachts afloat only reached 50, all told. But from this time the popularity of yachting rapidly grew, and club after club followed in quick succession. —London Times.

Paid the Farmer For His Trouble.

A farmer in China, Me., recently heard smothered squawking in his henhouse, and 'twas midnight. When he went out, he found the henhouse door ajar, and sounds indicated that the intruder was still within. Therefore the farmer slammed the door, bolted it and posted himself outside the henhouse until morning did appear. Then he looked in the window and discerned a neighbor, who came contritely forth and paid the farmer $28 for time, loss of sleep, etc. Still people say there is no money in farming. —Lewiston Journal.

First Glass Windows.

The first glass window in England was one put in the Teltrom abbey in the year 680 A. D. Glass windows did not come into general use for many hundred years after that date. As late as 1577 the glass casements of Ainsworth castle were regularly taken down and packed away whenever the owner and his family went visiting.—St. Louis Republic.

A LEGAL COMPLICATION.

Michigan Law Gives the Mineral Range Train Robbers an Unusual Chance.

In the case of the people against Dominick and Edward Hogan, William Butler and others, accused of the Mineral Range express robbery near Houghton, Sept. 15, the prosecution is in a quandary. The case is soon to be called for trial. Meanwhile the prosecution has to solve a very delicate legal problem or forego the hope of convicting all of the five men at present under arrest.

The specific charge against the five prisoners is robbery. The Michigan statute defines robbery as the theft of property by means of violence to the custodian or owner thereof, or intent to do great bodily injury or to kill in case of resistance. Fear is made an essential element of robbery, thus implying that the person or persons in charge of the property must be put in fear of death or great bodily injury. The maximum penalty in Michigan is imprisonment at hard labor for life. Dominick Hogan was the agent of the express company, and the $70,000 stolen was in his charge. If he relinquished possession of the money through fear of violence, he was robbed and was not himself a robber.

On the other hand, if he was a party to the theft and feared no injury, then no robbery was committed, and none of the prisoners can be convicted of a more serious offense than larceny, the maximum penalty for which is five years' imprisonment. Therefore, to secure a conviction of any of the accused on the charge, the prosecution must prove the innocence of Dominick Hogan, whom it has caused to be held two months in jail, and whose good name has been ruined.

The only alternative appears to be the withdrawal of the charge of robbery and substituting the charge of larceny, the punishment for which must be very light as compared with the just deserts of such audacious criminals. The defense will make this legal technicality the main point in their line of action during the trial.—Minneapolis Journal.

A FIGHTER WITHOUT LEGS.

A Colored Man With No Legs and One Arm Makes Things Lively.

City Jailer Tola Canova says that "if they ever send him out again to arrest a one armed, no legged man he ain't going to go." Tola's resolution is on account of an experience he had with an individual of that description a day or two ago. Tola was kicked in his dinner by a no legged man and felt so bad about it that he was almost tempted to send in his resignation.

It seems that Peter Moody, a colored man, who lost both legs and one arm in a railroad accident, filled up on pure unadulterated cussedness at a cost of 5 cents a drink, and proceeded to paint East Jacksonville in bright vermilion. The first thing he did was to fire his pistol at a boy who drives an ice wagon for Martin Ferguson. The boy outran the bullet, and his cries brought Officer Moore to the scene, but Moody stood on the stumps of his legs in the middle of the road and defied the officer to come near him, at the same time waving in the air, in a reckless manner, a formidable looking revolver.

Officer Moore telephoned for assistance, and Sergeant Thames and Tola Canova went to the scene. They had the hardest kind of a struggle with the disorderly individual, who inflicted upon each of them some very painful blows with the stumps of his legs and arm. Finally, however, they got him in a cart, and by choking him succeeded in keeping him quiet. The blow of the stump that caught Tola in the stomach lifted him in the air somewhere in the neighborhood of three feet.

Moody is now in the city jail. He will be turned over to the county authorities on a charge of assault with intent to kill.—Florida Times-Union.

The Great Gulf Storm.

A late letter received from Biloxi, Miss., gives a more hopeful view of the situation. Hundreds of men are busy in repairing damages caused by the storm, and in a few weeks everything will be restored. The heavy rains which followed the great winds did great service in melting and washing away the salt debris that was left on shore. The writer says, "Even the flower beds in the Montross House yards were washed clean and show no signs of their salt bath." The wharves are being rebuilt, and the vessels high and dry on the road are being wrecked and removed. Right in front of the Montross House the wreckage of several vessels and lumber yards accumulated and greatly protected the property. The yard fence was the only one left standing along the entire beach. The destitution in Biloxi is reported as being rapidly lessened. Among the prominent citizens of Biloxi who lost their lives in the great storm was Captain W. H. Patton of Back Bay. He was on the schooner La Marsh, and he and all his crew were lost. His remains were found lashed to his schooner some days after the storm had subsided.

To Deport Consumptives.

Since the great majority of the medical fraternity of Massachusetts have recently subscribed to the belief that consumption is a contagious disease, it has been borne in upon many besides those directly interested in consumptive persons through family or other ties that the proposed work of the new Invalid Aid society, one of the latest of Boston's benevolent institutions, is business as well as benevolence. A moment's reflection convinces every one that if a disease whose annual harvest in this country, and especially in this district, dwarfs all the other diseases, including even the epidemics wherever there are such, is communicable, as now appears, then it everybody's business, in common self defense, to promote the migration of consumptives and a fund for the deportation of consumptives too poor to travel is a public hygienic precaution.—Boston Transcript.

Lightning Strikes Through Feathers.

A family residing in Washington, Ga., was considerably shocked during an electrical storm a short time ago by the lightning striking the telegraph and electric light wires which pass the house. After the storm had subsided it was ascertained that a large fig bush in the garden had been struck and a hen and three chickens which had sought shelter under the broad leaves killed. The chickens were found under the hen, which was sitting in a natural position with not a feather ruffled.—Atlanta Constitution.

IT LOOKS LIKE A SCHEME.

The Midwinter Fair to Be Used to Circumvent the Chinese Exclusion Acts.

The Chinese village that is to be constructed and maintained at the Midwinter fair may prove of interest to visitors from abroad, but the Chinese who are back of the enterprise did not originate it for that purpose, but in order to get another opportunity to add several hundred coolies to the present population of this country.

The Chinese believe that the resolution passed by congress granting to the Midwinter fair the same privileges that had been granted to the Columbian exposition—namely, the entry of foreign goods free and permitting to enter the country the laborers, artists and others of foreign nations connected with the exhibits of those nations—will offer them an opportunity to land some more of their countrymen.

They have placed the matter in the hands of their attorneys, and from the expressions of certain prominent Chinese it appears that they have received advice that coincides with their wishes in the matter.

Like all the schemes that the Six Companies go into, it will be for making money, and the plan they will pursue in this instance became public at the custom house yesterday.

Already the scheme has been put in operation, and negotiations have been opened with coolies in China who desire to become residents of the United States.

Little Pete, on behalf of the Six Companies and other Chinese interested, is in charge of the affair and will see that it is made a financial success.

Little Pete is the go between in all cases where money is used for the illegal landing of Chinese, and he is considered one of the shrewdest "fixers" doing business at the custom house. He has been given instructions to arrange for the importation of another gang of supposed actors, and for several weeks he has been in correspondence with those who are to assist him in China.

Letters have been forwarded to China announcing that all who desire to come to the United States and avoid the trouble that the exclusion acts present can do so by becoming members of the Chinese village that is to be imported for the Midwinter fair.

Under the resolution passed by congress, if it will apply in this case, the number that will be permitted to land in order to participate in the fair is not limited, and how many will be designated by Little Pete and his associates has not been made known. It is expected, however, that fully 300 will avail themselves of the excellent opportunity that will be presented, and for that privilege each one must pay $200.—San Francisco Examiner.

A VIVID DREAM.

A Passenger Kicked Out a Sleeper Window and Threw Himself to the Ground.

A young business man of Minneapolis bought a furnace and had it set up on Saturday. Yesterday he worked all day showing his wife how to run it so she would not burn the house down, and last evening took a sleeper for St. Louis. Near Fulton he had a vivid dream.

He thought his house was afire and his family was locked up inside. With yells of desperation which fairly froze the blood of the other passengers in the sleeper, he kicked in the door and found the floor burned away, his wife and everything in the house cremated, and he himself landed in the cellar with a heavy thud. The blow awoke him, and picking himself up he found himself by the side of the railroad track. Glancing about him, expecting to see the train a wreck and the other passengers killed, he saw in the starlight his train vanishing in the distance. He had actually kicked out the double window of his berth with his barefeet and thrown himself feet first through the window to the ground while the train was running 25 miles an hour, and was unhurt, save three cuts on his left leg, caused by the broken glass.

The passengers notified the conductor, and when the train was backed they found the man walking to meet it. He was clad only in his nightclothes. It was almost impossible to believe his story, but his condition, and the deserted berth containing his clothes, and the broken window confirmed it.—Moline (Ills.) Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Curious Will Contest.

A curious will contest, according to Paris papers, is about to be tried in the Seine courts. Five years ago a Russian princess died, leaving a large fortune. There was great surprise among her relatives when the testament was opened. By one of its clauses she left 5,000,000 francs to the person who would remain a year in the chapel to be erected above her grave in the Fere la Chaise. The body of the princess, according to the legendary report, lies in a crystal coffin in a wonderful state of preservation. No one of her relatives has been able to remain longer than two or three days in the chapel. What will become of the 5,000,000 francs is the question.

The Comet Has a Short Tail.

Professor Brooks of the Smith observatory has obtained his third observation of the new comet first discovered by him a short time ago. Its position at discovery was: Right ascension, 12 hours 21 minutes; declination north, 12 degrees 55 minutes. At the third observation its position was found to be: Right ascension, 12 hours 25 minutes; declination north, 14 degrees 52 minutes, which shows the rate and direction of motion since discovery. As seen through the telescope the comet appears quite bright and has a short tail. This is Professor Brooks' nineteenth comet discovery.—Geneva (N. Y.) Dispatch.

Ancient Stationers.

In mediæval times the stationarius, or stationer, held official connection with a university and sold at his stall, or station, the books written or copied by the librarius, or book writer. Such is the origin of the modern term stationer, one who now keeps for sale implements of such service, and not usually the productions of literary persons.—Harper's Bazar.

A Lost Bride.

An absentminded groom in Rome, Ga., forgot that he was to be married the other day, and when the time for the ceremony arrived he was not present. An examination showed that he had overslept himself. He apologized, but the father of the bride refused to accept him as a son-in-law, and the engagement was broken.—Detroit Free Press.

MARRIED.

JONES—CALVERT—At Independence July 4th 1894 by Hon. Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge, Mr John I. Jones and Miss Georgia May Calvert.

Several new announcements in the candidates column this week.

Mr. and Mrs. F. K. Andrews of Bishop spent several days in town this week.

H. P. Nelligan has been awarded a contract for painting the Courthouse.

The Independence land office was moved last Monday and is now in running order.

Miss Grace Gifford of Bishop is a guest of the Misses Bell of Camp Independence.

The Board of Supervisors met on Monday evening, all the members being present.

Miss Lena Johnson of Luning, Nevada, is visiting with Miss Etta Naylor at Independence.

Jas. Daley came down from Fish Spring on Monday, bringing with him fifty-eight ounces of gold.

The married men of Independence have a pretty good nuf. They walked over the line with the boys in hollow style.

There was some talk of a footrace on the Fourth, but nothing materialized. Spencer was on hand with a sack, but was unable to make a match.

F. W. Forbes Esq. places himself before the people as candidate for the office of District Attorney, subject to the action of the Democratic County Convention. Mr. Forbes is the present incumbent. He has served the people in this capacity for several years and is thoroughly conversant with the duties of the position.

Superintendent Holmes of the marble quarry says he will be inconvenienced somewhat by the stopage of trains. He had a considerable quantity of blasting powder in transit, and it is delayed on the road some where. He expects to receive a supply next week from Los Angeles by stage and it is likely that operations will not be delayed.

Dr. I. J. Woodin announces himself this week as a candidate for the office of Coroner and Public Administrator, subject to the action of the Republican County Convention. He is at the present time County Physician. He is well qualified to fill the office to which he aspires, and if elected will perform his duties in a thorough business manner.

In the announcement column will be found the card of Bertrand Rhine as candidate for the office of Supervisor of the third District. Bert is a native Inyoite, has been in business here for many years, and if chosen to fill the position is certain to work unceasingly in the interest of his constituents. The office of Supervisor is the most important in the list of county officials, and good, wide-awake business men should be selected to serve.

W. H. Walker of Olancha announces himself this week to the voters of Inyo County as a candidate for the office of Assessor. For the past two years Mr. Walker has had charge of the collecting of sheep license tax and the ability with which he performed that duty commends him for the position to which he aspires. He has spent the greater part of his life in Owens Valley and consequently is familiar with the business of the county and will make a diligent and conscientious officer.

Directors' Meeting.

The Directors of the 18th District Agricultural Association met at Independence last evening. They fixed the time for holding the coming fair to begin September 18th and continue four days. A proposition made by the citizens of Independence to have the Directors take charge of the races was accepted. The premium list was revised all except the 10th department, and a committee of ladies from each town in the District was appointed to revise that. The Directors instructed the printing committee to provide a sufficient number of premium lists and such other printing as may be necessary, and have published 100 copies of the constitution and by-laws. The committee of arrangements, consisting of Robinson, Shepherd and McIver, will have charge of securing a suitable race track and parade ground and such other necessary matters. Liberal subscriptions have been made toward race purses, and the list is steadily increasing. In the neighborhood of $1,000 will be offered in purses.

The Fourth.

The Fourth of July celebration at Independence was more successful than the most sanguine promoters expected. Owing to the fact of there being no trains, and all visitors had to come by private conveyance. All points in the Valley were well represented, Lone Pine particularly so. There were three large coaches from that place besides many smaller rigs. The exercises in the pavilion were conducted in a highly interesting and entertaining manner. At 12 o'clock a sumptious lunch was spread in the Courthouse grove and the visitors made cordially welcome. There was an abundance of good things and ample justice was done to efforts of the committe in charge. After the pic-nic a baseball game was played between the Independence nine and the Big Pine natives, resulting in a victory for the latter. It was a close and interesting game till the seventh inning, when the natives piled up ten runs, winning by a score of 18 to 12. Children's sports followed this and then the crowd adjourned to the race track to witness a half-mile dash between Proxy and Borrego, the former winning with ease piloted by E Rose. The ball at the pavilion was the affair of the season. The ball is the largest in the county and it was filled to overflowing. The Harmony Orchestra had procured the latest popular music for the occasion, and the sweet strains discoursed were a pleasure of themselves. The highest praise is due the management who worked unceasingly against adverse circumstances to make the affair a success. The visitors expressed themselves in the highest terms of the enjoyment afforded them. The peace officers were alert to prevent anything of an unpleasant nature occurring. It was a jolly good Fourth of July. It must have been, for everybody says so.

A Fatal Draught.

On the morning of July 4th the sad news was telegraphed to Independence that James Daley had been accidentally poisoned that morning. He had been at Independence the day before and had been drinking some. It was a habit with him after indulging to drink vinegar. On the morning of the Fourth one of the men occupying the cabin with him had occasion to use some cyanide of potassium and had poured it in a pickle jar and left it on the table. Daley came in, saw the jar and supposing it contained vinegar, took a large swallow of it. He immediately perceived that he had made a mistake and called out to know what the bottle contained. When informed of its contents he said, "I am poisoned. Can't you do something for me?" He staggered against the wall and in a few moments fell dead. A Coroner's inquest found a verdict in accordance with the above facts. Among his comrades and those who knew him Jim Daley was held in the highest esteem. Honest, generous to a fault and kind hearted, he had many friends who sincerely mourn his sudden and untimely death in the full vigor of his manhood. He was buried at Big Pine.

The Strike still On.

At the hour of going to press there is no practical change in the railroad situation. A telegram from Chicago announces that the Mayor will call upon all able-bodied citizens to preserve order. Superintendent Haley of the Santa Fé says he has seven engines fired up and will move the delayed passengers. A bulletin from Sacramento announces all quiet there with the strikers in possession of the depot. A stage line is running between Sacramento and Reno and another between Mojave and Los Angeles. This, with the Mojave and Keeler stage gives us direct communication with Los Angeles. There is nothing definite as to when there will be a train over the C. & C.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

In autumn the old Randolph homestead looked as if it were showered with gold. The great elm trees, transmuted by the touch of this Midas of the seasons, stood in a yellow glory of myriad leaves, which every breath of the cool west breeze scattered profusely eastward, where, with the still unchanged grass, they formed a spangled carpet of green and gold. The apples thronged the crooked boughs of the orchard, some like glowing rubies, others like the famous fruit of the Hesperides, though there was no guardian dragon to give them a fictitious value. The broad roof of the house itself was littered with innumerable little golden scales, of workmanship far beyond the skill of any human goldsmith, yet of absolutely no market value. What is the significance of this yearly phantasmagoria of illimitable riches, worthless because illimitable? Is it a satire or a consolation? Does it mock the poor man's indigence or cause him to hope again for competence? It comes as the guerdon of Nature, after her mighty task is done; but when she has composed herself to her wintry sleep it is trodden into the earth and forgotten, and the new year begins his labors with new sap and naked buds. It is only the human world that has to bear the burden of inheritance; and perhaps we shall never enjoy true wealth till we have learned the lesson of the trees.

Poor Mr. Randolph certainly had little else beside autumn leaves wherewith to satisfy his creditors, and the winter of his discontent was close upon him. There is a philosophy for the poor and a philosophy for the wealthy, but the philosophy that can console the debtor has yet to be discovered.

Born and brought up in the custom of sufficient resources, he had never contemplated the possibility of want. There had seemed to be something noble and high minded in meeting without question all demands upon him, but when the supply actually ran short things wore a different aspect. Had he spent his whole fortune simply in paying his son's drafts he would at least have had the comfort of putting the whole burden of the responsibility on his son's shoulders. But unfortunately the larger part of the loss was due to private rashness of his own. When he found that Ed's rapacity was getting serious the devoted gentleman betook himself to Wall street and speculated there. The brokers treated him as Richard III proposed to treat his wife—they had him, but they did not keep him long. His speculations after he returned home were probably more edifying than those he indulged in on the street.

The revolting suspicion that he had been a fool began to germinate in Mr. Randolph's mind. This suspicion, which is the salvation of some men, is the destruction of others. The integrity of Mr. Randolph's moral discrimination began to deteriorate from that hour. Having enacted all his life the part of his own golden calf in the wilderness, his overthrow left him destitute of any criterion of conduct. He talked violently and volubly about his wrongs, and discussed various schemes, more or less impracticable and improper, of evading his liabilities. Beatrix was naturally the chief sufferer from this ungainly development of her father's character, and she was also obliged to bear the brunt of most of the concrete unpleasantness of their situation. She had to talk to the creditors, to extenuate her father's side of the case, to hold out fair hopes and to smooth over disappointments, and when she had wearied herself in parleying with the enemy she had before her the yet harder task of pacifying and encouraging her father, who had listened to the dialogue from the head of the stairs, and fell upon her with a petty avalanche of complaints, questions, suggestions, scoldings and querulousness. Beatrix loved her father with all her heart, but she was of a penetrating and well balanced mind, and often had difficulty in not feeling ashamed of him. Insensibly she began to treat him as a fractious and supersensitive child, who must at all costs be humored and soothed, and when she felt her own strength and patience almost overtaxed she would only say to herself, "No wonder poor father has to give up when I find it so hard."

But her troubles did not end with her father. There was a certain Mr. Starcher, the grocer's son; the grocer divided with the innkeeper the highest social consideration of the village. He was a young gentleman of highly respectable character and education. After leaving school he had studied for a year at a business college in New York; he was a member of the Young Men's Christian association, and a person of gravity and religious convictions. A week or two after Mr. Randolph's misfortune became known he put on a suit of black clothes, relieved by a faded blue necktie, and called formally on Miss Randolph. After the first courtesies had been exchanged he said that he desired in the first place to put the minds of Miss Randolph and her good father at ease regarding the little account between his firm and them. The money was not needed, and so far as he was concerned might remain unpaid indefinitely. "And I should like to say, too," he continued, with a manner of almost melancholy seriousness and a husky voice, "that groceries—or anything else I could get you—might be yours, permanently, if I could—you would—that you might consent to unite your life to mine. My father contemplates retiring from active business. I have never before spoken to you of this, but in seasons of trouble—we say things—and I have often thought, when we were singing in the choir together—that—we might be very happy—that it was our destiny. I have been in New York and seen the great world, but you are the wife I would choose from among them all." He had a smooth, round, fresh colored, innocent face, that seemed made for dimpling smiles, but which never indulged in them.

Beatrix felt a sensation of absurd alarm, like the princess in the fairy tale, under a spell of enchantment to mismate herself in the most grotesque manner conceivable. Mr. Starcher was so much in earnest, and so ludicrously sure, apparently, that the success of his suit was among the eternal certainties, that a vision of a long wedded life with him, amid an atmosphere of meal tubs, salt cod and pickles, interspersed with psalm tunes and solemn walks to and from church on Sundays—this desperate panorama of inanimate existence rose up before her in such vivid imaginative vraisemblance that she was impelled to protest against it with more than adequate vehemence. She gasped for breath, rose from her chair and said: "Mr. Starcher, it is terrible; I would rather die!" Then, perceiving, compassionately, that he would feel cruelly wounded as soon as his astonished senses enabled him to comprehend the significance of her words, she added, "It would be wicked for me ever to think of being married; you must see that I"— Here she paused, partly from emotion, and partly because she was unable at the moment to behind herself of any conclusive argument in support of her assertion that, for her, marriage would ever be a crime. One certainly would not have drawn that inference from the superficial indications. A silence ensued, prickly with spiritual discomfort. Mr. Starcher was the first to find his tongue, and he carried off the honors of the encounter by observing with tearful gentleness that he should claim the privilege, just the same, of not presenting the little account for settlement. This magnanimity was none the less genuine because the materials for it were slender, and Beatrix long afterward found comfort in recalling it to mind.

But there was yet another adversary for her to engage, and he was in some respects more formidable than Mr. Starcher, because his position and education rendered his pretensions less monstrous—nay, there even seemed to be a sneaking disposition on Mr. Randolph's part to accord him at least a negative support. Mr. Vinal, the Unitarian clergyman, was in fact, from an unworldly point of view, a tolerably inoffensive match. He was studious, decorous and endowed with grave and unobtrusive manners. He was not handsome, but there was a certain masculine concentration in his close set gray eyes and long narrow chin which was not in itself unpleasing.

His voice, if somewhat harsh, was resonant and assured; and, coming as it did from a chest apparently so incapacious, produced a sensation of agreeable surprise. It would have been unreasonable not to respect the man, and churlish not to feel amiably disposed toward him; but for Beatrix it was impossible to love him. He lived in a little white wooden house with green blinds, close to the white, green blinded church. He possessed an imposing library, in which was not a single book that Beatrix could have brought herself to read, and the main object of his endeavors was, apparently, to make all the rest of the world think and live like himself. Moreover, though he approved of music, he neither knew nor cared anything about it.

Mr. Vinal began his operations by a private interview with Mr. Randolph, from which he came forth with a countenance whose serenity made Beatrix's heart sink. The dialogue which followed was of extreme interest to both of them.

"Have you made any plans regarding your immediate future?" the minister began, in an unembarrassed and businesslike tone. "We cannot doubt, you know, that providence, in bringing this affliction upon you, has had some wise and merciful end in view. You have talents; perhaps but for this you might have kept them folded in the napkin. Adversity forces us out of our natural idleness, and stimulates us to use what means we have to win our own way in the world. Have you thought of anything to do?"

Beatrix's spirits rose again; he was not thinking of marrying her after all. "I've been thinking I might give lessons on the piano," she said. She happened to be seated at that instrument, and as she spoke she let her white fingers drift down the keyboard from bass to treble, from depression to hope, from gloom to light, winding up with a sort of interrogative accent, as much as to say, "Why shouldn't I be good for something?"

"Very right," said Mr. Vinal; "I have nothing to object to in that; indeed I had intended to propose it. You could also, unless the instructions of the late Professor Dorimar were wholly valueless"——

"What?" interrupted Beatrix, in a voice which, supported as it was by a chord sharply struck, made the minister start in his chair. After a moment's pause she said, her eyes still bright with indignation: "Professor Dorimar, who is now in heaven, taught me more and better things than you have ever dreamed of! He showed me that I have a soul!"

"Surely I have done as much as that!" faltered Mr. Vinal, who was confused by this sudden outburst.

"No, for you know nothing about it," said Beatrix loftily. "You have only been told that it is so—you have read it in books—and you repeat what you have been told, and no doubt you think you believe it. But you can never know it!" continued the young lady, with a fiery emphasis on the verb, "because you can't understand music."

"I intended nothing against Professor Dorimar," protested the minister, who was amazed and daunted by the passion and pride that he had unawares caused to kindle in her lovely face. It was perhaps the first time he had occasion to observe that the spirit of the old Virginia Randolphs—the descendants of the cavaliers—was as haughty and untamed in this tender hearted American girl as in that terrible ancestor of hers who rode with Prince Rupert.

Beatrix made no reply, but sat with her head erect and flushed cheeks, and one hand still on the piano keys, as if ready once more to smite terror into the soul of her visitor should he again step amiss. A piano, it seems, can be used as a weapon of defense even against one who has no comprehension of music.

"What I was about to remark was that you might teach singing as well as playing," said Mr. Vinal circumspectly. "There are, I believe, a number of persons in the village who would be willing under the circumstances to place their children under your instruction."

"It is no favor to be taught music under any circumstances," returned Beatrix, kindling again. "Whoever thinks otherwise does not deserve to learn! And there are other places in the world besides this miserable little village, and people who are wiser and better!"

"You surely do not mean to intimate that you contemplate going anywhere else?" demanded the minister in some consternation.

The fact was that such an idea had never until that moment definitely presented itself to Miss Randolph's mind; but in her present aroused condition she could see and entertain many possibilities that would have seemed audacious or impracticable an hour before.

"Why not?" she said; "I was not born to pass my life here!"

"But I—it has never been my intention to leave here!" exclaimed Mr. Vinal anxiously.

"What satisfies you does not satisfy me," answered the young lady.

"But your father, in a conversation I have just had with him, has informed me that he will not oppose my addressing you with a view to marriage," said the clergyman, in a solemn tone.

"He would not have done so if he had been himself," replied Beatrix warmly. "He is broken down by trouble and sorrow, else you would not have ventured to ask him! But I will tell you, since he could not, that I am not a piece of land or furniture to be sold for the satisfaction of creditors! I will not be a burden upon my father or any one; but I have a right to myself—to my own self! Do you think I am so much afraid of being poor, or of starving, that I would marry anybody to escape it? I do not love you! I do not love you, Mr. Vinal, and so I will never marry you. I will have love and music or nothing! You do not know me, sir; none of you here seem to know me. I am an American girl, and I will not be bargained away or buried alive by any one! You shall see," she added, rising and walking to the veranda window, "that I can make my own way, and take care of myself! You shall see that Professor Dorimar taught me something worth knowing!"

Mr. Vinal was unable to stand up against a succession of blows like this, delivered by one whom he had heretofore supposed to be the type of gentleness and docility. His mind was narrow and slow to adapt itself to new impressions, and it would have taken him a long time to frame a suitable reply to Miss Randolph's unexpected attack. But the opportunity was not allowed him.

For as Beatrix stood by the window, with flushed cheeks and glowing eyes, and her heart beating harder than usual with indignant emotion, her glance fell upon two figures advancing arm in arm up the avenue. One of them she recognized, the other was unknown. But a strange tingle of anticipation went through her nerves. Something was going to happen—something great, something for her! The crisis of her fate was at hand, and she was more than ready for it. Therefore she did not start or cry out, but only smiled with an air of beautiful triumph, when Hamilton Jocelyn, relinquishing the arm of his companion, ran up the steps of the veranda, took both her hands in his, and said as he bent toward her:

"My dear girl, I bring you fame and fortune!"

"Gold mining," remarked the enthusiastic boomer, "is what pays its followers glorious returns. Why, gentlemen," and his voice took the fine oratorical turn of a man with a few claims to sell, "I know a man who made a hundred thousand dollars in a month."

"Ugh," grunted an old fellow who looked as if he had been there, "what about the hundred thousand who didn't?" and the question seemed to cast a chill over the subsequent proceedings. — Detroit Free Press.

Mr. Brown Mudville—Oh, that's from the furnace!—Truth.

The Danbury News Man's Wit.

Mr. Bailey's wit has a delicious mental flavor. In fact, it is always the shrewd, thoughtful man that enjoys it. It is not in long, inane dialogues, but a flash of thought. The humorist says a poor man came to him, with tears in his eyes one day, asking for help for his destitute and starving children.

"What do you need most?" asked Mr. Bailey.

"Well, we need bread, but if I can't have that I'll take tobacco."

One day a solemn and religious Danbury man hailed a charcoal peddler with the query:

"Have you got charcoal in your wagon?"

"Yes, sir," said the expectant driver, stopping his horses.

"That's right," observed the religious man, with an approving nod, "always tell the truth, and people will respect you."

And then he closed the door just in time to escape a brick hurled by the wicked peddler.

One day I asked Mr. Bailey if they had lazy men in Connecticut.

"Lazy men!" he exclaimed. "Why we have a man in Danbury so lazy that instead of shoveling a path to the front gate he pinches the baby's ear with the nippers till the neighbors come rushing in to tread down the snow."

Mr. McMasters was buying a home of Mr. Bailey and asked him if the house was cold in the winter.

"Cold!" said Bailey cautiously. "I can't say as to that. It stands outdoors."

Speaking of the Indian raids, says Bailey: "The Modocs have made another raid on our people and murdered them. If ever our government gets hold of these savages, gets them right where they cannot escape, gets them wholly into its clutches, some contractor will make money."—From "Twenty Years of Wit and Humor."

Two Interpretations.

A young farmer who had been converted at one of the revivals went before the next conference and asked for a license to be a preacher. "I know I am born to preach the word," said the applicant, "for I have had three visions, all the same, and it has made a lasting impression on me." "What was your vision?" asked a bishop. "Waal, I saw a big, round, blue ring in the sky, and inside, in great gold letters, were 'P. C.' It meant 'Preach Christ,' and I want to join the conference." The argument was about to carry when an old pastor stood up in the back part of the hall and said, "Young man, we don't doubt your intentions, nor do we doubt you saw the vision with the golden 'P. C.,' but I am of the opinion that that 'P. C.' meant 'Plow Corn.'" The convert is still a farmer.

CROSSING THE ATLANTIC

Usually involves sea sickness. When the waves play pitch and toss with you, strong indeed must be the stomach that can stand it without revolting. Tourists, commercial travelers, yachtsmen, mariners, all testify that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is the best remedy for the nausea experienced in rough weather on the water. Nervous and weakly travelers by land often suffer from something akin to this, and find in the bitters its surest remedy. No disorder of the stomach, liver or bowels is so obstinate that it may not be overcome by the prompt and thorough remedy. Equally efficacious is it for chills and fever, kidney and rheumatic trouble and nervousness. Emigrants to the frontier should provide themselves with this fine medicinal safeguard against the effects of vicissitudes of climate, hardship, exposure and fatigue.

WELCOME WORDS TO WOMEN.

Many times women call on their family physicians, suffering, as they imagine, one from dyspepsia, another from heart disease, another from liver or kidney disease, another with pain here or there, and in this way they all present to their easy-going doctor, separate diseases, for which he prescribes, assuming them to be such, when, in reality, they are all only symptoms caused by some womb disorder. The suffering patient gets no better, but probably worse, by reason of the delay, wrong treatment and consequent complications. A proper medicine, like Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, directed to the cause would have promptly cured the disease.

Mrs. HARRY TAPPAN, of Reynolds, Jefferson Co., Neb., writes: "For two years I was a sufferer. A part of this time had to be carried from my bed. Was racked with pain, had hysteria, was very nervous, no appetite and completely discouraged. A few bottles of 'Favorite Prescription' effected a perfect cure." Sold by all dealers in medicines.

LOVE.

Mind and Heart of God were wedded!
Unto them a child was given!
All the earth was dead with darkness,
But this child appeared from heaven,
And a flood of light came with him,
Bringing peace and sweet content
Unto all whose hearts were open
To the being God had sent.

Where he makes his habitation,
There he dwelleth evermore;
Faith, the bar upon the gateway;
Hope, the seal upon the door,
Keeping him a willing captive
From his erstwhile home above.
Mighty child of mighty parents,
Everlasting, perfect Love.
—Adele R. Ingersoll in Harper's.

LADY OF GOLLERUS.

On the shore of Smerwick harbor, one fine summer's morning, just at daybreak, stood Dick Fitzgerald "shoghing the dudeen," which may be translated smoking his pipe. The sun was gradually rising behind the lofty Brandon, the dark sea was getting green in the light, and the mists, clearing away out of the valleys, went rolling and curling like the smoke from the corner of Dick's mouth.

"'Tis just the pattern of a pretty morning," said Dick, taking the pipe from between his lips, and looking toward the distant ocean, which lay as still and tranquil as a tomb of polished marble. "Well, to be sure," continued he after a pause, "'tis mighty lonesome to be talking to one's self by way of company, and not to have another soul to answer one—nothing but the child of one's own voice, the echo! I know this, that if I had the luck, or maybe the misfortune," said he with a melancholy smile, "to have the woman, it would not be this way with me! and what in the wide world is a man without a wife? He's no more surely than a bottle without a drop of drink in it, or dancing without music, or the left leg of a scissors, or a fishing line without a hook, or any other matter that is noways complete. Is it not so?" said Dick Fitzgerald, casting his eyes toward a rock upon the strand, which, though it could not speak, stood up as firm and looked as bold as ever Kerry witness did.

But what was his astonishment at beholding just at the foot of that rock a beautiful young creature combing her hair, which was of a sea green color, and now the salt water shining on it appeared in the morning light like melted butter upon cabbage. Dick guessed at once that she was a Merrow, although he had never seen one before, for he spied the cohuleen driuth or little enchanted cap which the sea people use for diving down into the ocean lying upon the strand near her, and he had heard that if once he could possess himself of the cap she would lose the power of going away into the water; so he seized it with all speed, and she, hearing the noise, turned her head about as natural as any Christian.

When the Merrow saw that her little diving cap was gone the salt tears—doubly salt, no doubt, from her—came trickling down her cheeks, and she began a low, mournful cry with just the tender voice of a new born infant. Dick, although he knew well enough what she was crying for, determined to keep the cohuleen driuth, let her cry never so much, to see what luck would come out of it. Yet he could not help pitying her, and when the dumb thing looked up in his face, her cheeks all moist with tears, 'twas enough to make any one feel for her, let alone Dick, who had ever and always, like most of his countrymen, a mighty tender heart of his own.

"Don't cry, my darling," said Dick Fitzgerald, but the Merrow, like any bold child, only cried the more for that.

Dick sat himself down by her side, and took hold of her hand by way of comforting her. 'Twas in no particular an ugly hand, only there was a small web between the fingers, as there is in a duck's foot; but 'twas as thin and as white as the skin between egg and shell.

"What's your name, my darling?" says Dick, thinking to make her conversant with him, but he got no answer, and he was certain now either that she could not speak or did not understand him; he therefore squeezed her hand in his as the only way he had of talking to her. It's the universal language, and there's not a woman in the world, be she fish or lady, that does not understand it.

The Merrow did not seem much displeased at this mode of conversation, and making an end of her whining all at once, "Man," says she, looking up in Dick Fitzgerald's face, "man, will you eat me?"

"By all the red petticoats and check aprons between Dingle and Tralee," cried Dick, jumping up in amazement, "I'd as soon eat myself, my jewel! Is it I eat you, my pet? Now 'twas some ugly, ill looking thief of a fish put that notion into your own pretty head, with the nice green hair down upon it, that is so cleanly combed out this morning."

"Man," said the Merrow, "what will you do with me if you won't eat me?"

Dick's thoughts were running on a wife. He saw at the first glimpse that she was handsome; but since she spoke, and spoke, too, like any real woman, he was fairly in love with her. 'Twas the neat way she called him man that settled the matter entirely.

"Fish," says Dick, trying to speak to her after her own short fashion, "fish," says he, "here's my word, fresh and fasting, for you this blessed morning that I'll make you Mistress Fitzgerald before all the world, and that's what I'll do."

"Never say the word twice," says she. "I'm ready and willing to be yours, Mr. Fitzgerald; but stop, if you please, till I twist up my hair."

It was some time before she had settled it entirely to her liking, for she guessed, I suppose, that she was going among strangers, where she would be looked at. When that was done the Merrow put the comb in her pocket, and then bent down her head and whispered some words to the water that was close to the foot of the rock.

Dick saw the murmur of the words upon the top of the sea going out toward the wide ocean, just like a breath of wind rippling along, and says he in the greatest wonder, "Is it speaking you are, my darling, to the salt water?"

"It's nothing else," says she quite carelessly. "I'm just sending word home to my father not to be waiting breakfast for me, just to keep him from being uneasy in his mind."

"And who's your father, my duck?" says Dick.

"What!" said the Merrow. "Did you never hear of my father? He's the king of the waves, to be sure?"

"And yourself, then, is a real king's daughter?" said Dick, opening his two eyes to take a full and true survey of his wife that was to be. "Oh, I'm nothing else but a made man with you, and a king your father! To be sure he has all the money that's down in the bottom of the sea!"

"Money!" repeated the Merrow. "What's money?"

"'Tis no bad thing to have when one wants it," replied Dick, "and maybe now the fishes have the understanding to bring up whatever you bid them?"

"Oh, yes," said the Merrow; "they bring me what I want."

"To speak the truth, then," said Dick, "'tis a straw bed I have at home before you, and that, I'm thinking, is noways fitting for a king's daughter; so if 'twould not be displeasing to you just to mention a nice feather bed, with a pair of new blankets—but what am I thinking about? Maybe you have not such things as beds down under the water?"

"By all means," said she, "Mr. Fitzgerald, plenty of beds at your service. I've fourteen oyster beds of my own, not to mention one just planting for the rearing of young ones."

"You have?" says Dick, scratching his head and looking a little puzzled. "'Tis a feather bed I was speaking of—but clearly yours is the very cut of a decent plan, to have bed and supper so handy to each other that a person, when they'd have the one, need never ask for the other."

However, bed or no bed, money or no money, Dick Fitzgerald determined to marry the Merrow, and the Merrow had given her consent. Away they went therefore across the strand, from Gollerus to Ballinrunnig, where Father Fitzgibbon happened to be that morning.

"There are two wor's to this bargain, Dick Fitzgerald," said his reverence, looking mighty glum. "And is it a fishy woman you'd marry? The Lord preserve us! Send the scaly creature home to her own people—that's my advice to you—wherever she came from."

Dick had the cohuleen driuth in his hand, and was about to give it back to the Merrow, who looked covetously at it, but he thought for a moment, and then says he:

"Please, your reverence, she's a king's daughter."

"If she was the daughter of fifty kings," said Father Fitzgibbon, "I tell you, you can't marry her, being a fish."

"Please, your reverence," said Dick again in an undertone, "she's as mild and beautiful as the moon."

"If she was as mild and beautiful as the sun, moon and the stars all put together, I tell you, Dick Fitzgerald," said the priest, stamping his right foot, "you can't marry her, she being a fish!"

"But she has all the gold that's down in the sea, only for the asking, and I'm a made man if I marry her. And," said Dick, looking up slyly, "I can make it worth any one's while to do the job."

"Oh, that alters the case entirely," replied the priest. "Why, there's some reason now in what you say. Why didn't you tell me this before? Marry her, by all means, if she was ten times a fish. Money, you know, is not to be refused in these bad times, and I may as well have the hansel of it as another that maybe would not take half the pains in counseling you that I have done."

So Father Fitzgibbon married Dick Fitzgerald to the Merrow, and like any loving couple they returned to Gollerus well pleased with each other. Everything prospered with Dick—he was at the sunny side of the world—the Merrow made the best of wives, and they lived together in the greatest contentment.

It was wonderful to see, considering where she had been brought up, how she would busy herself about the house and how well she nursed the children, for at the end of three years there were as many young Fitzgeralds—two boys and a girl.

In short, Dick was a happy man, and so might have continued to the end of his days if he had only the sense to take proper care of what he had got. Many another man, however, besides Dick has not had wit enough to do that.

One day, when Dick was obliged to go to Tralee, he left the wife minding the children at home after him and thinking she had plenty to do without disturbing his fishing tackle.

Dick was no sooner gone than Mrs. Fitzgerald set about cleaning up the house, and chancing to pull down a fishing net, what should she find behind it in a hole in the wall but her own cohuleen driuth.

She took it out and looked at it, and then she thought of her father the king and her mother the queen, and her brothers and sisters, and she felt a longing to go back to them.

She sat down on a little stool and thought of the happy days she had spent under the sea; then she looked at her children and thought on the love and affection of poor Dick, and how it would break his heart to lose her. "But," says she, "he won't lose me entirely, for I'll come back to him again, and who can blame me for going to see my father and my mother after being so long away from them?"

She got up and went to the door, but came back again to look once more at the child that was sleeping in the cradle. She kissed it gently, and as she kissed it a tear trembled for an instant in her eye and then fell on its rosy cheek. She wiped away the tear, and turning to the eldest little girl told her to take good care of her brothers and to be a good child herself until she came back. The Merrow went down to the strand. The sea was lying calm and smooth, just heaving and glittering in the sun, and she thought she heard a faint, sweet singing inviting her to come down. All her old ideas and feelings came flooding over her mind, Dick and her children were at the instant forgotten, and placing the cohuleen driuth on her head she plunged in.

Dick came home in the evening, and missing his wife he asked Kathleen, his little girl, what had become of her mother, but she could not tell him. He then inquired of the neighbors, and he learned that she was seen going toward the strand with a strange looking thing like a cocked hat in her hand. He returned to his cabin to search for the cohuleen driuth. It was gone, and the truth now flashed upon him.

Year after year did Dick Fitzgerald wait, expecting the return of his wife, but he never saw her more. Dick never married again, always thinking that the Merrow would sooner or later return to him, and nothing could ever persuade him but that her father, the king, kept her below by main force.

"For," said Dick, "she surely would not of herself give up her husband and her children."

While she was with him she was so good a wife in every respect that to this day she is spoken of in the tradition of the country as the pattern for one under the name of the Lady of Gollerus.—F. Crofton Croker in Short Stories.

MAKING PICTURES OF DISEASES.

An Interesting Talk With a Photographer of Bellevue Hospital—"Before and After" Studies.

Every large hospital has a history book, and in it are carefully recorded the histories of the important cases. In former years this was done exclusively by written descriptions. Recently the mere writing has come to play a very minor part in the history books. Photography has become a branch of surgery and one which is growing more important every day. A great many photographs are now taken by doctors in private practice. Some of these amateurs have become very expert and would as soon think of doing without a medicine case as their camera.

Mr. O. G. Mason, the photographer at Bellevue, was recently asked about this branch of his business.

"Do not persons often object to having their ailments and imperfections reduced to paper in this way?"

"Oh, yes, but not as frequently as one might think. It is curious, but I have often noted the phase of human nature which causes the average man or woman to take pleasure in being photographed under almost any circumstances. I have seen women pose before my camera here with the air of professional beauties. Of course many of the patients are beyond feeling in the matter one way or the other. Those who are about to undergo operations which they realize may be fatal or who are at the point of death, as I often take them, naturally pay very little attention to me and my work, except that in the former case it seems to impress them strongly with the gravity of the situation and thus enhances their fears."

"Do you give those who have been cured any of the pictures of themselves?"

"Not as a rule, although requests for them are very frequent. It is our aim to keep the pictures out of anything like general circulation, and nobody can obtain them without giving a very good reason, except, of course, the medical profession, whose motives we understand."

"What are the most difficult cases to photograph?" asked the reporter.

"Those where the interior of the throat is involved. It is necessary to put the lens down into the throat and use a flashlight. The lens is, of course, very small, and one of the difficulties is to get the focus on just the right spot. That is chiefly guesswork, and the pictures are often unsatisfactory. The locomotor diseases, which make it impossible for the patient to sit still, of course present difficulties. Certain forms of skin disease, too, whose peculiarities lie in discoloration, are hard to take satisfactorily. Particularly in this the case where the color is blue, which makes but little impression on the plates.

"Surgical and what I may call popular photography have many differences. As an example, the ordinary photographer, as a rule, takes only the head and bust or the whole figure. I photograph these and also the most minute sections of the human body, the pictures of which must be enlarged. This makes necessary a great many sized lenses.

"One has to be a bit of a doctor in this work," he resumed. "The surgeons do not always explain just what they want brought out in the picture. I have to know that."

At this stage of the conversation a young doctor appeared in the doorway. Behind him were four children, who entered the room in a slow and rather solemn procession. Two nurses brought up the rear.

"We have some work for you this morning, Mr. Mason. Let us see what you can do in the art department with these little patients."

Three-year-old Malachye was the only one of the children who showed no uneasiness, so it was decided to take her picture first. But one wondered why it was necessary to take it at all. Her smiling face and sturdy little figure suggested nothing but the rosiest kind of health, as indeed she has now. The picture was taken to show the great improvement she had made. Six months ago she was brought to the hospital suffering from curvature of the spine, and for a long time her back was kept straight by a plaster cast.

The Arabian mother who left her at the hospital has never come to see her and has apparently forgotten little Malachye. But she does not lack care. She gets rather a superabundance of it, for her sparkling eyes and little round face are very pretty, and she is everybody's pet.

The photographs in the history books of a great hospital like Bellevue show some strange and grewsome things. But a great many of the life tragedies which they evidence have a happy ending after all. The pictures taken before and after the operations very often show that there have been complete cures, meaning pain allayed and clouded lives brightened.

And often the drama is in a lighter vein. People come to the hospital suffering only from wounded vanity, caused by an unsightly nose perhaps or some other similar defect. The surgeons can very quickly make a becoming nose out of an unbecoming one. They raise the bridge and readjust the member generally to conform to the lines of beauty. The photographs show some remarkable changes in expression brought about by the improvement of the nasal appendage. The picture of one man, taken before the operation, makes him miserably insignificant and mean looking. But you look at the one taken after the work has been done, and you see a Napoleon in expression, and all because the surgeons have given him a nose of classic outline.

The lips are subject to the same transformation. When they are abnormally thick, pieces are cut out lengthwise. The lips recede from their undue prominence, and a coarse face becomes a reasonably refined one.—New York World.

Pussy's Little Joke.

A Saco man has declared war on chair seats made of cane or any open work, and for good reason too. He was sitting quietly last week on a cane seat chair when without any warning he was seen to bound into the air, chair and all, and under the chair was dangling a cat whose claws were imbedded in the rear of his thin pants. He jumped nearly to the ceiling and thought he had sat down on a paper of tacks. It was only a feline joke, which she will be wise not to repeat in that locality.—Bangor Commercial.

Hot Weather and Hotter Winds.

We have heard responsible officers of the old Indian flotilla avouch that they have seen the glass register 200 degs. in the sun at Bushire. It was a long time ago, however, and there lies the excuse. Perhaps 180 degs. has been recorded, for a brief space, under peculiar circumstances. But when 160 degs. is passed, every fraction becomes horribly perceptible. Ten degrees above this is not uncommon. The coolest place to be found at Shikarpur sometimes has been 140 degs. But 120 in the shade may be regarded as the temperature of the very hottest climates in the world—when no wind blows. Fancy that, as the minimum, for forty-eight hours at a stretch. At Sukkur—the year round, mark!—residents endure a minimum of 97 degs.; happily there are very few whites among them. But this is in a time when no wind blows, and winds are the rule from March to July.

There is the Suk, which rises, as scientific persons allege, in the Kachi desert; but ordinary mortals will not be persuaded that it has its origin in the upper world. All life withers before it; but there is worse. The Bad-i-simoon kills outright everything it encounters—not only that, it burns up tissue and cartilage, so that the limbs can be pulled asunder when the storm has passed by. Of course it is rare and brief and very narrow in its track. From the roof of his house in Jacobabad an officer watched it sweep by, destroying actually everything it met, but he, fifty yards from the edge, felt only a warmer glow than usual.—London Standard.

He Saved His Wad.

"That reminds me of a fellow I knew out at Durango, Colo.," said a mining man last night as he dropped into a reminiscent mood. "In Durango there is an 'upper town' and a 'lower town.' Collins—that was his name—on the night in question started for the lower town. He had something like $450 on his person. The way was lonely and dark, and it was not long before he saw a couple of fellows step out in front of him.

"'Throw up your hands!' was the order to Collins, and up they went like a shot. He comprehended the situation at a glance, and to the surprise of the footpads burst out into an uncontrollable fit of laughter.

"'What's the matter,' they asked.

"'Why, fellows,' said he, 'I'll tell you what's the matter. I haven't had anything to eat since yesterday, and all I have to say is that if there is anything to be made on this little job I would like to be in it with you fellows.' Continuing, he said, 'Search me if you want to, and if you don't find anything, why, give me a hand at the game.'

"Collins' little trick worked to a charm. 'Oh, we won't search you,' was the reply he received; 'go ahead and get something to eat. Here's four bits, and my pard here will give you another four bits.'

"So Collins went on to 'lower town' richer than when he started."—Chicago Mail.

One Way of Earning a Living.

There are all sorts of ways of earning one's living, but I doubt if one could find an occupation hedged about with more danger or calculated to keep the nerves strung at a higher pitch than that affording support to a son of Ham at Bethesda park. The courageous negro utilizes his good natured face to form the disk of a sunflower, at which a certain number of shots can be fired with the hardest kind of a ball for a stipulated sum.

Drawn by the sign, "Hit the Nigger," crowds are attracted to the place, and people impatiently wait in line their turn to try their skill, while the darky, apparently unmoved by the discomfort of the sport, keeps up a counter fire of mirth provoking banter at the poor success of the patrons. The flower is painted on a large canvas representing a garden scene, behind which the man stands at a distance of about forty feet from the ball throwers.

Some degree of protection is afforded the fellow by a wire netting which he is allowed to pull over his face as soon as he sees the ball fly from a person's hand. The slightest hesitation on his part, however, would result in a general smashup.—Kate Field's Washington.

An Arab Tradition.

There is an Arab tradition cited in Burton's "Gold Mines of Midian" regarding the creation of the camel, which illustrates the popular but erroneous opinion that this animal is ugly in form and temper.

The story goes that when Allah determined to create the horse he called the south wind and said, "I desire to draw from thee a new being; condense thyself by parting with thy fluidity." The Creator then took a handful of this element, blew upon it the breath of life and the noble quadruped appeared. But the horse complained against his Maker. His neck was too short to reach the distant grassblades on the march; his back had no hump to steady a saddle; his hoofs were sharp and sank deep into the sand, and he added many similar grievances.

Whereupon Allah created the camel to prove the foolishness of his complaint. The horse shuddered at the sight of what he wanted to become, and this is the reason that every horse starts when meeting its caricature for the first time.—Rev. S. M. Zwemer in Christian Intelligencer.

Using the Feet in India.

In the making of wooden combs in the cities of India I have seen the comb held straight up by the feet, while the workmen marked the teeth with one hand and with the other directed the instrument that cut them. The wood turner directs the handrest with his great toes; so, generally, do Egyptian and Arabian turners. In smoothing twine or sewing a bridle the Indians hold the article between the first and second toes.

When the butcher cuts his meat into small pieces, he holds his knife between the first and second toes, takes the meat in both hands and pulls it up across the knife. I have seen a child climb a tree and hold a branch between his toes. These are enough details concerning the constant, universal use of the foot.

The First Iron Bridge.

The first iron bridge ever erected in the world and which is in constant use at the present time spans a little river in the county of Salop, on the railroad leading from Shrewsbury to Worcester, England. It was built in the year 1778, and is exactly 96 feet in length. Total amount of iron used in construction 378 tons. Stephenson, the great engineeer, in writing concerning it, said, "When we consider the fact that the casting of iron was at that time in its infancy, we are convinced that unblushing audacity alone could conceive and carry into execution such an undertaking."—St. Louis Republic.

IN OLDEN TIMES.

When the Theatrical Ticket Speculators Were in Clover.

HOW ONE OF THEM WON A WAGER.

The Trick Was One of Jimmy Hyde's Whom All Old Time New York Show People Know Well.

"The palmy days of the ticket speculator are over," said the old theatrical man. "There's nothing in the business nowadays. Newspaper criticisms, the result of public sentiment, were the first things to kill the business, and it never has and never will revive. Why, it was nothing in the old times for a man to make $25 and $50 in a night speculating. It wasn't necessary, either, for a man to stand in with the box office in order to make money, as speculators have to nowadays. A speculator could be stuck with 15 or 20 tickets and still make some profit. So far as making money now, though, there is little in it. A speculator is in luck if he can knock out $3 a night. All of the old timers who made big money speculating years ago are either dead or in other branches of the business now. A trickier or smarter crowd of fellows than some of the old time speculators could not be found.

"About the most successful game I ever saw worked by a speculator was the scheme gotten up by Jimmy Hyde, then prominent among ticket speculators, to beat the French ball. Jimmy, who is now with the Casino, made up his mind that it would be an easy thing to beat the ball out of several hundred dollars. Max Hirsch, who was then and is now treasurer of the Metropolitan Opera House, was telling Hyde about the elaborate arrangements that were being made for the French ball that year, and how it was bound to be a great success on account of the entire suspension of the free list, when Hyde exclaimed: 'Suspend the free list, eh? Well, you can suspend and be darned, but just the same I'm going to pass in at least 15 people.' 'I'll bet you don't pass in a soul, barring yourself,' replied Hirsch.

"The result was a heavy wager, Hyde betting that he would pass in at least 10 strangers for nothing, giving none of them tickets or passes. Every one who heard of the bet laughed at Hyde, but Jimmy simply smiled and said nothing. Those who knew Jimmy Hyde felt confident that he would succeed in doing what he had boasted he could do, although nobody could see just how he was going to manage it. Well, on the night of the ball Hirsch stuck around the door of the opera house all night, watching every one that passed in. It was just about midnight when Hyde, followed by a meek looking individual who carried something under his coat, showed up in the vicinity. Leaving his companion on the corner, Jimmy walked into the lobby and approached a young man who was leaning against the wall.

"'Going in?' asked Hyde.

"'Can't. Ain't got the price?' responded the stranger.

"'How much have you got?' asked Hyde.

"'Two an a half.'

"'Well, it's money anyway, so come on,' and Hyde walked out of the lobby, followed by the young man.

"'Now, see here,' said Jimmy when they reached the corner, 'when you get inside don't stop a second, but just go right past the winecroom down toward the stage. At the left end you'll find a flight of stairs. Go down them, and you'll find yourself in the cellar right under one of the gratings which open on Thirty-ninth street. Will you do that?'

"'I don't see any use of doing all that, but you get me in and I'll do it.'

"'All right,' said Hyde, and he took the violin from under his companion's coat and handed it to the young man. It was an old and battered violin case.

"'Take that and walk right through the door,' said Hyde. 'If any one says anything to you, just say "musician," and pass on. When you get in the cellar, pass it up to me.'

"The young man took the case and walked into the lobby and past the doormen without any trouble. In three minutes he was under the grating and had passed the case up through a small aperture. Nine other men, each of whom paid from $2 to $4 apiece for the use of the violin case, were successfully passed through. Hirsch stood at the door the whole time and never once saw through the game. It was one of the doormen who caught on first. He thought it remarkable that so many of the orchestra were coming in late, and when Hyde's eleventh man tried to pass through he nailed him. 'Musician,' said the man hoarsely, but it was no go. The doormen took the case away and opened it. Of course it was empty.

"Hyde saw that the game was up and almost burst with laughter when he saw his man go sailing out into the street, with the old violin case flying after him. The truth flashed on Hirsch in an instant. Two mutual friends whom Hyde had let into the secret at the last moment testified that 10 men had been passed through on the old case, and Hirsch paid over the amount of the wager like a man. It didn't take the crowd long to drink up the money, and when it was gone Hyde was forced to blow in the money he had collected from those he had passed in too. That was a mighty neat piece of work, that was, and there wasn't another man in New York but Jimmy Hyde who would have thought of it. It seems that Hyde had made up his mind to beat the ball in that way long before the bet was made, and that he only accepted the wager because he saw a chance to rake in a few dollars more.

"Yes, the day of the ticket speculator is over, and, despite the old saying that history repeats itself, I don't believe it'll ever come around again."

"John, dear," said Mrs. Hicks, "I'm making a shirt for the heathen. Come here and let me fit it on you, will you?"

A Giant Human Hand.

Upon the east side of North Seventh street, about midway between Poplar street and Girard avenue, stands a strikingly curious tree, which attracts the attention of every passerby. It stands just in front of a stable yard, and the employees of the place say that dozens of people come to them every week and make remarks or ask questions about the strange growth. From the thickness of the trunk at the base the tree is probably about forty years old, but its branches and foliage are new and fresh and look as though they were but the growth of a year or two. The trunk runs straight from the ground to a height of about fifteen feet.

Above this for a short distance is a thick globular mass of foliage, the leaves appearing to grow directly out of the the wood. Above this growth run up three thick stalks or stumps, six or eight feet high, also covered with a dense, close mass of foliage. When the tree is viewed from the north side it presents a startling resemblance to a giant human hand protruding from the earth. The three big stumps at the top represent the three middle fingers, and upon either side of these can easily be seen configurations of the surrounding foliage which correspond to the little finger and thumb.

The explanation of the phenomenon is a curious one. The tree was once full grown and vigorous, but was attacked by blight or some other disease, and the dead trunk was pruned down to its present proportions, whereupon the present new growth developed.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Butte's Hermit Miser.

In the western part of town and near the village of Burlington there is a strange character who excites no end of comment by his peculiar actions. He is the owner or leaser of a mine, the shaft of which is about fifty feet in depth. This strange individual works the mine all by himself, and to the people whom he meets he is an enigma. He steadfastly refuses to be interviewed, and although prospectors on neighboring mines have made repeated efforts to even get a salutation from him they have signally failed.

Every morning as regular as clockwork he descends into the mine by means of the ladder, and remains there until evening. Occasionally he is seen to hoist a bucket of waste, and it is presumed that this action is made necessary by the fact that he is driving a crosscut single handed and alone, and gets cramped for want of room.

But the most peculiar thing in connection with this singular man is his manner of working. Every two weeks he changes shifts and works during the nighttime for two weeks, to change at the end of that time to two weeks' day shift. Some of the miners who were in that locality believe that the man is an old time miner who has become so accustomed to working two weeks night and two weeks day that he cannot overcome the habit.—Butte Inter Mountain.

Improved Ventilation.

An improved system of ventilation has been introduced in the great hall of the new Sorbonne in Paris, the principle resorted to being that of maintaining the walls at a higher temperature than that of the air which they inclose. In order to accomplish this, a mixing chamber is located beneath the auditorium, and hot and cold air are mixed to the temperature desired; the air is forced into the auditorium through a great number of small holes in the floor and in front of the seats, the openings being covered by a wire netting. Before the entrance of an audience the walls are thoroughly warmed by forcing air heated to 200 degs. into a conduit which delivers the air into a space behind the moulding and close to the floor. The wall is thus heated to a temperature of 100 degs.—a temperature which, by radiation, will keep the audience comfortable—at the same time ventilating the hall with air at 60 degs., derived from the mixing chamber. All downward cold drafts are thus prevented, the currents of air all being upward, owing to the heated surface.—New York Sun.

Artistic Auto-Suggestion.

I recollect that at the dress rehearsal of "Hamlet" M. Mounet-Sully was late. The stage was waiting. I sent to have him summoned by the call boy. He returned in a moment and told me that M. Mounet-Sully could not come down from his dressing room then because his costume was not quite ready. "What! It was finished a week ago, that costume. It was tried on and worn. It is complete and perfect." Yes, the costume was complete, but under his doublet M. Mounet-Sully wore braces, and at the last moment he had considered that he must have black ones—mourning braces—because Hamlet was dressed from head to foot in the trappings and the suits of woe. Those lower strata of costume had annoyed him. "The public would not see them, but I should see them." This was not the auto-suggestion of Talma, but the sentiment comes from the same need—the need for the artist to believe himself the character he plays, the hero he represents.—Jules Clarette in North American Review.

Tender Feet.

Summer pedestrians suffer from tender feet to a great extent, and the trouble is generally attributed to the shoes and the heat. Wide toed shoes are obtained, but after every long walk the feet are sore, and several days are required to heal them. To prevent this and to harden the feet for long walks they should be soaked in a tub of water heated as much as the flesh will endure. To every half pailful of this hot water add a piece of nitrate of potassium about the size of a small walnut. This can be obtained at any drug store. The feet should be treated to this bath about twice a week, but if considerable walking is done and the feet continue sore, the bathing should be more frequent. Women as well as men will find this useful in hot weather, and even the professional tramp would find relief from his pains in this way.—Yankee Blade.

A FRIEND IN NEED

Story Told by Henry Irving of the "Busted" Actor's Good Samaritan.

WAS NOT ALWAYS A WEALTHY MAN

Once He Was Very Poor and Unknown, But Now He is Rich and Very Famous in all Our Lands.

The place was a cozy room in a cozy house in a quiet street off the Strand, London. The time was Saturday; the hour, midnight. A company of professional men, composed of some of the lawyers, doctors, newspaper men and actors whose names are famous on both sides of the Atlantic, was scattered in groups about the rooms smoking and chatting after the Saturday night supper, which had become a standard institution with them. In a sheltered corner over by the fireplace sat a small knot of men, every one of whom had reached the top, or at least the front rank, of his profession. The talk, drifting in a smooth, desultory, half sleepy way from phase to phase, had gradually assumed a retrospective hue. From one to another the story had passed, each telling the tale of an empty stomach, or an empty pocket, or a hopeless tramp of 30 miles or so in thin shoes along a snowbound road in search of employment.

Henry Irving, thoughtfully smoking, with an air of deep attention, had not spoken and did not speak until the others, having exhausted their stock, turned to him. He had experienced harder luck than any of them, and they knew it. He looked up at them for a moment and then, after a pause, said:

"The recollection uppermost in my mind just now, while you boys have been talking about tramping and winter roads and all that, is of a certain Christmas dinner at which I was present. I wonder whether any of you remember a poor fellow, long since dead—Joe Robin—who played small parts in London and outside it, and who made the one big mistake of his life when he entered the profession. Joe had been in the men's underwear business and was doing well when an amateur performance for a charitable object was organized, and he was cast for the part of the clown in a burlesque of 'Guy Fawkes.' Joe belonged to one of the bohemian clubs, and on the night of the show his friends among the actors and journalists attended in a body to give him a 'send-off.' He played that part capitally, and the mischief might have ended there, but some one compared him to Grimaldi. His fate was sealed. He sold his stock, went on the stage, and a few months later I came upon him playing general utility on a small salary in a small theater in Manchester. One relic of his happy days still remained to him. He had retained shirts, collars and underwear sufficient to last him for a generation.

"But if Joe lacked ability as an actor he had a heart of gold. He would lend or give his last shilling to a friend, and piece by piece his stock of underwear had diminished until only a few shirts and underclothes remained to him.

"The Christmas of that year—the year in which we played together—was perhaps the bitterest I ever knew. Joe had a part in the pantomime. When the men with whom he dressed took off their street clothes, he saw with a pang at his heart how poorly some of them were clad. One poor fellow without an overcoat shivered and shook with every breath of the wind that whistled through the cracked door, and as he dressed there was disclosed a suit of the lightest summer gauze underwear which he was wearing in the depth of that dreadful winter. Poor as Joe was, he was determined to keep up his annual custom of giving his comrades a Christmas dinner. Perhaps all that remained of his stock of underclothing went to the pawnbroker, but that is neither here nor there. Joe raised the money somehow, and on the Christmas day was ready to meet his guests.

"Among the crowd that filed into the room was his friend with the gauze underclothing. Joe beckoned him into an adjoining bedroom, and pointing to a chair silently walked out. On that chair hung a suit of underwear. It was of a comfortable scarlet color; it was of silk and wool; it was thick and warm, and it clung around the actor as if it had been built for him. As the shirt fell over his head there was suffused through his frame a gentle, delicious glow that thrilled every fiber of his body. His heart swelled almost to bursting. He seemed to be walking on air. He saw all things through a mist of tears. The faces around him, the voices in his ears, the familiar objects in his sight, the very snow falling gently outside the windows, seemed as the shadows of a dream with but one reality—the suit of underwear."

"His feelings seem to have entered your heart," said one of the listeners.

"They might well do so," replied Mr. Irving, "for I was that poor actor."—New York Tribune.

Valuable Pumps.

The hydraulic pumps at the Combination shaft cost $3,000,000; the first set put in cost $750,000. The surface pump plant at the same shaft cost $400,000. That at the Union shaft cost $650,000. At the Yellow Jacket's shaft the steam pump plant cost nearly $800,000, while that at the Forman shaft cost $500,000. Statistics show that the pumping machinery on the Comstock is not only the most costly but the most powerful in the world.—Virginia (Nev.) Enterprise.

Where Icebergs Come From.

Icebergs come from the edges of the arctic regions, from the icebound coasts of Greenland and Labrador, where huge bergs, broken from the front of the glaciers at the point where they reach the sea, start on their long journeys toward the south, driven by the great current which flows down from Baffin's bay into the northern Atlantic ocean.—Youth's Companion.

THE STRIKE.

CHICAGO July 7, 1894.

The strikers and State soldiers came together this afternoon and a pitched battle was the result. The number of killed and wounded may never be known as the mob carried off a number who were seen to fall, and whether they were dead or wounded is not known at this time. The fight occurred at intersection of 4th street and Grand Trunk tract, which has always had an evil name.

Serious trouble was expected early this morning. Before 9 o'clock a mob had gathered and made attempt at burning the Grand Trunk depot. A company of the 2d Infantry, sixty-seven strong, commanded by Capt. Keely, was hurried to the spot. It reinforced a number of deputies, and the mob was pressing from the round-house. The mob gathered at 5 p m, and began to burn freight cars and tear up track. A squad of police attacked the mob. Several police fired, as did the other side, but no one was injured. Mob then went back to 48th street and while a portion of the crowd—which by this time was fully 8000 strong—occupied the militia, a gang was set to work to remove obstructions. The mob had now grown very ugly, howling and occasionally letting a stone fly. This condition of affairs lasted two or three hours. Finally the mob was encouraged by the fact that the troops did not begin active operations. A crowd of men pushed freight cars from siding on track where stood the train which brought militia to the scene, trying to block the track. Capt. Keely conferred with Superintendent and concluded it was impossible to clear the track, and that as the mob was growing wilder every minute, the best thing was to leave the place and proceed to extremities of city.

The crowd was wild when the troops retreated. Keely drew his men back slowly, turning to confront the crowd when it came too close. Again and again the mob, shouting, howling and using the vilest language, rushed everywhere.—Keely met things steadily before threatening crowd came on. Mob made a rush at the Yard-master and fired, but bullets flew wide of the mark. The strikers were fairly wild with rage. Chunks of coal, coupling-pins and other things were hurled at the troops. Lieut. Reed was struck by one of the stones and fell to the ground like a dead man. Keely concluded the time had come and quickly gave the word to his men to charge, and the handful of militia sprang forward with leveled bayonets. John Burke, standing in front of the mob, was hurling coal as fast as he could. One of the first soldiers in the charge plunged his bayonet clear through his body, the point coming out at the back. Burke went down like a log. The mob broke before the charge, but quickly rallied and after a short pause came on again. Troops, deputies and police waited no order, but sent a shower of bullets on the mob. It was all over in three minutes, and the militia marched into the train and with the deputies returned to the city. They looked as though they had been through a battle when they disembarked, covered with dust and badly bruised by flying stones.

CHICAGO, July 7, 1894.

The daily News has issued an extra giving the following information, and vouches for its correctness in every particular: "Late this afternoon the president of the American Railway Union informed a daily reporter that he had received a message from M. E. Lawrence, the President of the First National Bank, saying that Vice-President Wicks of the Pullman Company would be willing to see him. Mr. Lawrence said he was willing to meet Wicks. Wicks, when seen later, said that Mr. Lawrence called on him and asked if he was willing to meet a committee of our employes. I told him I would like to meet such a committee, and have always been willing to meet such a delegation at any time. I don't expect Committee will come to me with intention of discussing arbitration. If they come to discuss the situation, I am ready to see them."

Supt. Atwater said: "The mob was not far away when we began to fire. For about three minutes the militia, deputies and police fought like devils, simply pouring lead into the crowd; men, dead and dying, were strewn along the track; number will probably never be known." At army headquarters, a request from Police Inspector that several companies of regulars and a gatling gun be sent to the scene added to the feeling.

SACRAMENTO, July 7, 1894.

The only new feature in California is the raise of the blockade in Los Angeles. In Northern California the blockade is more complete than ever. Out of Oakland and San Francisco not a train is moving. At San Jose strikers have even held the coast division of the Southern Pacific, and it is useless to dispatch trains from city. Two companies of militia have made an effort to overcome the strikers at San Jose.

At Sacramento there has been no further trouble. Neither U. S. Marshal nor militia have made any effort to assist the railroad company in moving trains. They have apparently thrown up the sponge until settlement of trouble shall be arrived at in the East. The strikers at Sacramento are as determined as ever. Many of the strikers are heavily armed with Winchesters and declare open war if any effort is made to move trains. The strikers have established soup houses.

The court-martial which is being held here adjourned this evening until to-morrow morning. With the exception of seven, all members of the company plead guilty of disobedience. It is thought they will be let off with a severe reprimand. The city is quiet. U. S. Marshal Baldwin was at the railroad depot this evening for the first time since the conflict on last Wednesday.

CHICAGO, July 8, 1894.

The report that the stockyard mob was gathered around and destroying the Pullman works is denied. President Debbs charges Cleveland with acting in the railroad interest. Yesterday afternoon the Committee appointed to investigate matters concerning the indebtedness of the Pacific Railroads to the Government and voted unanimously to report all indebtedness of the Central and Union Pacific Companies. If this is agreed upon, the Companies mentioned will not be allowed the first mortgage which has been asked for. Most likely that a sinking fund will be provided to defray the first mortgage.

Pullman failed to arbitrate and it is said that Monday night if Pullman does not settle over a million men will go out in various cities, and every occupation of workingmen will be represented.

There has been no renewal of hostilities to-day and everything is quiet.

LOS ANGELES, July 9.

Strikers are apparently losing ground rapidly at this point. The Santa Fe Co. has dispatched another overland train this morning, and nearly all of the Santa Fe local trains are arriving and departing on schedule time. The Southern Pacific Company is also running many of its local passenger trains, and has made up a freight train for the East and one for Santa Barbara. Both trains will be dispatched to-night or to-morrow morning. A large number of Deputy Marshals have been armed with rifles and ordered to report to-morrow morning to guard the passage of the passenger train north to San Francisco. The crowds at the railroad depots are gradually growing smaller

WASHINGTON, July 9.

The absence to-day of the riotous scene that has marked the past few days is a source of special satisfaction to the postal officials. Arrangements to relieve the condition of the mail service in California and other sections are being made by the Department. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. will carry mail from San Francisco along the coast in both directions. The boats will stop at many points on the coast to deliver and collect the mails. About 100 special service officials have been ordered to connect with the boats at various points in California, Oregon and Washington.

A statement was telegraphed here from California that strikers were about to apply to United States Courts to compel the S. P. R. R. Co. to show cause why they should not be compelled to operate their roads under the terms of their contracts. This was not disagreeable news to the War Department which rather hoped that such a course would be taken for it would oblige the railroad company to supplant the efforts of the military by every means in its power, and there is a suspicion that it has been a little lax in that respect so far.

President Cleveland this evening issued a proclamation similar in its tone to that relating to Chicago, relating to the unlawful obstructions, combinations and arsemblages in California, North Dakota, Montana, Oregon, Washington, Idaho' Calorado, Utah, New Mexico, Wyoming and along the lines of railroads and post-routes engaged in interstate commerce and carrying U. S. mails, for the enforcement of the laws and preventing the obstruction of mails and commerce. The President has employed military and militia forces, and calls upon and commands all persons connected with the unlawful obstructions, combinations and assemblages to retire to their homes before 4 o'clock Tuesday afternoon. This practically amounts to martial law.

CHICAGO, July 9.

The Ninth Infantry U. S. A., under the command of Charles A. Bartlett, arrived in this city this afternoon from Sackett's Harbor, New York.

A committee of seven appointed by the labor leaders to ask Mayor Hopkins for a city committee of influential business men who would undertake to force Pullman to arbitrate, have finished their conference. Mayor Hopkins referred them to the committee appointed by the City Council a week ago.

The Mayor has called on the Governor for another regiment of State troops. 50 men attempted to stop a train of wagons loaded with meat for the city trade, which left the stockyards last night. The police came to the aid of the drivers and their assailants were driven off.

At the labor meeting resolutions were adopted requesting Samuel Gempers, the President of the Federation of Labor, to come to Chicago at once, and authorized the appointment of a committee to request the City Council to demand of the President the withdrawal of all military bodies. A letter was also sent to Gov. Altgeld insisting that he compel the withdrawal of troops immediately.

General Miles this afternoon issued a General Order to the troops instructing them under the President's proclamation to disperse rioters. The committee representing the Labor Union met the committee from the City Council at 1 o'clock. The chairman of the Council Committee suggested that a committee of five prominent business men be appointed to visit the Pullman company to determine if they had anything to arbitrate. He suggested that the Committee consist of two of the Pullman Co., two prominent citizens to be appointed by the Judge of Cook county and the fifth to be chosen by them afterwards. The Labor Committee appointed a sub-committee of three who with the Council Committee went at once to confer with Vice-President Wicks of the Pullman Company..

An immense labor meeting has been called to be held at the stockyards this afternoon. Mayor Hopkins was informed that the meeting would be held in spite of his orders against the congregation of the people.

Nearly 1,000 armed men arrived at Pullman to-day. They were from the 2d, 3d and 4th regiments of Indiana troops. Soon after their arrival the U. S. troops left for Chicago.

The President's proclamation against the assembling of crowds and advising citizens to absent themselves from such gatherings caused much renewed excitement in Pullman. Forward persons were not slow to charge that the Federal officials had entered into a combination with the Pullman interest to break up open air meetings that have been a daily feature in that town.

SPOKANE, July 9.—A mob at Sprague last night stoned a special train carrying two companies of militia, ditched freight cars in front of it, and ran a car on culvert east of town and burned it. Trestle west of town was also fired and 15 feet of it burned. The train with militia is at Sprague depot with the track destroyed on both sides of it. Regular troops arrived here this afternoon.

DENVER, July 9.—If the Federal Grand Jury which will meet in Chicago to-morrow does not cause the arrest of President Debbs, he will be arrested on a warrant issued by the U. S. District Court of this county. Application for the warrant has already been made.

SACRAMENTO, July 10.

Ex-Atty.-General A. L. Hart, legal adviser to the strikers, has counseled them to respect troops, and prospect is that U. S. soldiers will meet with no resistance when they reach here.

Harry Knox, Chairman of Committee, to-night sent following telegram to Gen-Managet Towne: "We, the members of the American Railway Union, will man, move and see safe to their destination all trains, including local, overland, mail, passenger and freight trains, on condition that no Pullman coaches be attached to any train, and that all employes who are now out and also those who have been discharged for refusing to handle Pullman coaches, be reinstated without prejudice. This has been our position since beginning of the strike." Knox states that his object in sending this dispatch is to refute the assertion of the S. P. Co. that strikers have at all times persistently refused to take out trains.

The attitude of the locomotive engineers is attracting much attention. They waited upon Supt. Fillmore at Sacramento this morning and said they were ready to return to work at a moment's notice. Fillmore said he would notify them if he should decide to accept their services.

CHICAGO, July 10.

The most startling event of the situation to-day was the arrest of President Debbs on indictment by U. S. Jury. He was taken to Court under arrest and released on $10,000 bonds. Indictments were filed against other officers of American Railway Union.

OAKLAND, July 11.

To-day the outlook was very warlike. 150 special police and Deputy Sheriffs were sworn in. R. R. officials early made arrangements to start trains simultaneously with those sent from Sacramento. Strikers threatened to kill engines that had fired up. Before deputies arrived, strikers charged the yards on the mole and were repulsed. They waited for reinforcements from Alameda mole, then charged again and the deputies moved away. After all the engines that had been run out were killed, the strikers withdrew.

No trains are running in Northern California except the Coast Division. At Los Angeles the strike appears to be effectually broken.

WEST OAKLAND, July 11.

A gang of strikers late this afternoon ditched two trains at East Oakland and completely blocked the tracks in order to prevent San Jose train from getting in. Feeling among R. R. men over outrage at Sacramento is intense. Engineers bitterly oppose Railway Union.

SACRAMENTO, July 11.

Samuel H. Clarke, engineer, Privates Byrnes, Gebharding and Clark are the men who were killed by derailment of train two miles south of this city. Wounded are Corporal Daumer, injured about head; Private Wilson, leg seriously lacerated; Private Dugan, left arm cut off; Private Ellis, internally injured. Daumer cannot live.

Derailment of train has resulted in severe condemnation of strikers. Many sympathizers have deserted since dastardly work of to-day and will be against strikers in future.

At 6 o'clock this a. m. steamers Alameda and Acme landed regular troops at Y street, which were met by several companies of militia, who had been ordered to keep crowd back, fearing attack by strikers and sympathizers. At 7 o'clock, regulars marched to depot, headed by Col. Graham and staff. After them came Hotchkiss and gatling guns, guarded by infantry and marines, with cavalry in the rear. The strikers had abandoned the situation and were no where to be seen. Sentinels were detailed to keep crowd safe distance from depot. After conference with Supt. Fillmore, Col. Graham ordered every one out of the depot, including newspaper reporters, and Supt. Wright, with aid of switch engines cleared the main track. Orders then issued to take East Overland, which had been delayed here since inauguration of strike, to San Francisco. Engineer Clarke, one of the oldest in Company's employ, took charge of engine. A railroad employe named Dunkamp acted as fireman, and Samuels was Conductor. Acting under orders from Col. Graham, 19 regulars of battery L, 5th Infantry, accompanied the train, and an ominous silence prevailed as it pulled out of depot. Strikers were not in a happy mood and hinted that harm would come before train reached San Francisco. Word soon reached here that train had been fired on and ditched. Also reported that Engineer Clarke had been killed by bullet and several regulars perished in wreck. Later advices show that not a single shot was fired. Strikers had removed rails for 100 feet and covered their dastardly work with sand. Although on the lookout for such cowardly tactics, Engineer Clarke plunged into the trap and his engine was overturned and several cars upset, with killed and wounded as above stated.

Div. Supt. Wright ordered wrecking crew to the scene of disaster and cavalry was sent to head of strikers. At 4 this afternoon the wounded men were brought here and taken to R. R. Hospital.

The regulars in an ugly mood over death and injury of their comrades and anxious for a skirmish. Strikers claim that Fillmore assured Col. Graham that road had been carefully gone over and he knew strikers would not resort to any desperate measure to win the strike. It was not until he assured Graham of the supposed good condition of the road that latter consented to send men to escort the train.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 11.

Harry Knox, the leader of the strikers, has issued the following:

"I desire to state on behalf of the American Railway Union that this Order had not the remotest connection with the ditching of the train between Sacramento and Davisville this afternoon by which several persons lost their lives.

"We condemn the act as outrageous, barbarous and entirely contrary to the spirit of the American Railway Union, which is engaged in an honorable struggle in the interest of labor, and is opposed to violence, or to sacrifice of human life. If this act were done by sympathizers we regret it; it is to injure rather than help us. We sincerely trust this act of violence will be the last."

SACRAMENTO, July 11.

Orders were given this evening to extend the guard lines to I street, fully a block from the depot. This is done to prevent the strikers from getting near the company's property.

The city is virtually under martial law to-night. Marshall Baldwin issued a proclamation warning all persons not to interfere with the railroad and to refrain from going into unlawful assemblages.

The Sheriff to night arrested F. D. Worden on suspicion of being implicated in the derailment. Worden is well known in this city. He has been quite prominent in labor circles and was recently sent as delegate to the Chicago Convention of railway men. The Sheriff also arrested A. Green Burt and H. E. Badner, strikers, for complicity in the wrecking of the train. They will be held pending an investigation.

Acting under the instructions of Col. Graham, a detachment of soldiers to-night visited headquarters and seized a number of rifles and about 100 shot guns. No resistance was offered by the strikers.

It is now asserted that a white man was shot by the militia on the river point. He was seen to drop from a tree. If so, the strikers carried him off.

Officers have found tools with which the rails were removed from the track, and know the parties that hid them.

CHICAGO, July 11.

General Manager Eagan says the strike is broken.

LATEST!

SACRAMENTO, July 13, 1894.

Situation about the same. Strike about broken in Chicago. No trains out of San Francisco yesterday. None out of Sacramento till trestle where wreck occurred is repaired, which will be several days. All quiet in Los Angeles. There was a fight yesterday afternoon at Oakland between the strikers and police; no serious results reported. S. P. Co., offers reward of $5,000 for arrest and conviction of parties who caused the wreck near Sacramento. Enough evidence has been secured to convict Badner and others arrested with him. An attempt will be made to run a train out of Oakland to-morrow.

CHICAGO, July 13, 1894.

The American Railway Union has declared the strike off. The Pullman men are still out.

Pullman has agreed to arbitrate and strike has been declared off.

BORN.

NEILL—At Bishop, July 5, 1894, to Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Neill, a daughter.

DIED.

MULHOLLAND—At Independence, Cal., July 9, 1894, Charles B. Mulholland, a native of Ireland, aged 56 years.

He was a just and upright man, who faithfully and fearlessly performed his duty as a citizen and as a man. He served his adopted country for three years and ten months during her hour of trial. He was never justly accused of a selfish act and died as he lived, beloved and respected by those who knew him best.

NEILL—At Bishop, July 6, 1894, Carrie V. wife of George W. Neill, aged 27 years.

Mrs. Carrie V. Neill died at Bishop on Friday of last week at the residence of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Stoutenborough. The announcement here of her death threw a gloom over the community, where she was held in high respect and affectionate esteem. Death is at all times a grim visitant, but when those nearest and dearest to us are taken away almost without warning, the affliction is indeed most hard to bear. We tender those so suddenly bereft our most sincere and heartfelt sympathy.

A new voting precinct has been established at Citrus.

The weather has been cloudy for the past few days with slight showers.

Regular meeting of Inyo Lodge No. 221 F. & A. M. to-morrow night.

Coroner Howell spent a couple of days in town this week on official business.

W. L. Zimmerman and John Clarke were down from Bishop early in the week.

A new trial of the Broder—Conklin suit will be had at Bridgeport on the 31st instant.

George Mead came down from Bishop on Wednesday. He has been on the sick list for several weeks.

W. T. Bunney has suffered considerably during the past week from rheumatism. Mrs. Bunney has also been quite ill.

The Supervisors adjourned on Tuesday. The fact of their acting as a Board of Equalization made the session longer than usual.

Mrs. Thomas of Lone Pine who has been ill for a long time past is now recovering. Dr. I. J. Woodin is in constant attendance.

Dr. J. S. McQueen returned to Bishop on Wednesday. The fact that he was kept busy all the time is the best proof of his success as a practitioner.

Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Densmore and Miss Elsie Gill are on their way home from Stockton, coming with a private conveyance over the Sonora road.

T. B. Scovil is serving a four month's sentence in the county jail on a charge of embezzlement. His trial required two days—and lots of patience.

The subscription list toward the races this fall is constantly growing. There is a strong probability that one or two sufficiently large purses will be offered to induce owners of Nevada horses to attend.

On or about May 20th, 1894, there left the Lacey ranch at Camp Independence one light bay mare, strip in face, branded 7_P on left hip. The finder will please communicate with R. Rossi, Independence, Cal.

C. W. Craig has been made an attorney of record to practice in the local Land Office. His four years services as Register has made him thoroughly familiar with land matters and all business of such nature intrusted to him will receive careful attention.

There will be a train arrive here to-day from Mound House having on board way mails and freight. It left Belleville this morning on time, but as there are a large number of cars attached and two engines it is expected that it will arrive here later. It is reported that Superintendent H. M. Yerington is on board. The train will return to-morrow at usual time.

They received a number of flesh wounds but no bones were broken nor were their eyes injured, though the rims of their hats were blown off.

Thinks Himself the Prince of Wales.

Proceedings have been begun in the supreme court to have Caspar Knauer, a manufacturer of frames and moldings at 102 Centre street, adjudged a lunatic. Upon the application of his wife, Katharina Knauer, Justice Beach today appointed Augustus C. Brown and Dr. Thomas W. Robertson a commission to conduct an inquiry as to his sanity. Knauer has been confined to a private asylum, Breezehurst Terrace, at Whitestone, Long Island, since April 4, 1891, and is said to be incurable. He imagines that he is wealthy, talks of gigantic speculations, thinks he is a great soldier and acquainted with all the generals in the army, and believes he is the Prince of Wales. He is violent and dangerous. His property is worth $50,000.—New York Recorder.

A Man with a History.

THE TERRIBLE EXPERIENCE THAT BEFELL JOHN W. THOMAS OF THETA, TENNESSEE.

Afflicted with a Peculiar Disease. His Body Covered with Lumps. Could not eat and Thought he was Going to dry up. His Recovery the Marvel of Tennessee.

(From the Nashville, Tenn., Banner.)

Mr. John W. Thomas, Jr., of Theta, Tenn., is a man with a most interesting history. At present he is interested in blooded horses for which Maury County is famous.

"Few people, I take it," said Mr. Thomas to a reporter who had asked him for the story of his life, "have passed through as remarkable a chain of events as I have and remained alive to tell the story.

"It was along in 1881, when I was working in the silver mines of New Mexico, that my troubles began; at first I suffered with indigestion, and so acute did the pains become that I went to California for my health, but the trip did me little good, and fully impressed with the idea that my last day had nearly dawned upon me, I hurried back here to my old home to die.

"From simple indigestion my malady developed into a chronic inability to take any substantial food, I was barely able to creep about, and at times I was prostrated by spells of heart palpitation. This condition continued until one year ago.

On the 11th of April, 1893, I suddenly collapsed, and for days I was unconscious, in fact I was not fully myself until July. My condition on September 1st, was simply horrible, I weighed but seventy pounds whereas my normal weight is 165 pounds. All over my body there were lumps from the size of a grape to the size of a walnut, my fingers were cramped so that I could not more than half straighten them. I had entirely lost control of my lower limbs and my hand trembled so that I could not drink without spilling the liquid. Nothing would remain on my stomach, and it seemed that I must dry up before many more days had passed.

"I made another round of the physicians, calling in one after the other, and by the aid of morphine and other medicines they gave me, I managed to live though barely through the fall."

Here Mr. Thomas displayed his arms, and just above the elbow of each there was a large irregular stain as large as the palm of the hand and of a purple color, the space covered by the mark was sunken nearly to the bone. "That," said Mr. Thomas, "is what the doctors did by putting morphine into me.

"On the 11th of December, 1893, just eight months after I took permanently to bed—I shall never forget the date—my cousin, Joe Foster, of Carter's Creek, called on me and gave me a box of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, saying they had cured him of partial paralysis, with which I knew he had all but died. I followed his directions and began taking the medicine, as a result I stand before you to-day the most surprised man on earth. Look at my hand, it is as steady as yours; my face has a healthy look about it; I have been attending to my duties for a month. Since I began taking the pills I have gained 30 pounds, and I am still gaining. All the knots have disappeared from my body except this little kernel here in my palm. I have a good appetite and I am almost as strong as I ever was.

"Yesterday I rode thirty-seven miles on horseback, I feel tired to-day but not sick. I used to have from two to four spells of heart palpitation every night, since I began the use of the pills I have had but four spells altogether.

"I know positively that I was cured by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and I believe firmly that it is the most wonderful remedy in existence to-day, and every fact I have presented to you is known to my neighbors as well as to myself, and they will certify to the truth of my remarkable cure."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are not a patent medicine in the sense that name implies. They were first compounded as a prescription and used as such in general practice by an eminent physician. So great was their efficacy that it was deemed wise to place them within the reach of all. They are now manufactured by the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., and are sold in boxes (never in loose form by the dozen or hundred, and the public are cautioned against numerous imitations sold in this shape) at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

CHAPTER III.

IN WHAT GUISE DELIVERANCE CAME TO HER.

"I'll just tell you what it is, Mr. Randolph."

What became of Mr. Vinal Beatrix never ascertained; she forgot about him for several minutes and when she looked round for him he was gone. Meanwhile Jocelyn introduced his companion to her as "Gen. Inigo, a gentleman interested in music;" and Mr. Randolph was extracted from his retreat, into which he had withdrawn under the impression that more duns were after him, and was likewise made a partaker of the general's acquaintance. The latter appeared in quite a different light from that in which we first encountered him. He had not only been assiduously instructed by Jocelyn as to the behavior he should put on, but the fresh country air and scenery and the tendency which all persons who live in some measure by luck have to hope for a fortunate turn in their affairs had combined to put him in a genial and optimistic frame of mind. As a contrast to the gloom in which they had lived of late this sunny mood of the general's seemed even more paradisiacal than would have been the case at a more cheerful time. His jokes and comicalities had an arch charm to the ears and eyes of Mr. Randolph and his daughter that would have perplexed the manufacturer of them.

A feeling of security and pleasant promise diffused itself in the air, though as yet there was no known foundation for it. It was 4 o'clock in the afternoon and dinner was over, but in consideration of the city habits of the guests preparations were made for one of those high teas which combine the best features of all meals. In the meantime the old ex-Virginian rummaged out a bottle of claret (which the general secretly wished had been whisky), and proceeded to dispense it with something of the courtly air that had belonged to him before misfortune and misanthropy had marked him for their own. But his hospitality was tempered by a haunting suspense. What was the general, and what did he intend? Evidently he must have had a purpose of no ordinary urgency to bring him all the way from New York city hither. His smiling bearing forbade the supposition that the purpose could be a hostile one, but why and in what way should it be friendly? It was only by an heroic effort that Mr. Randolph subdued the evidence of his curiosity, and perhaps did not succeed in disguising it so completely but that his guests could amuse themselves by detecting it.

At length, when the bottle was nearing its last glass, Jocelyn turned to the young hostess with his most fascinating manner and said: "My dear Beatrix, I wonder whether your piano is in tune? The general and I are pining for some music. The fall season hasn't begun yet, you know, and positively I don't believe either he or I have heard any singing worthy of the name for four months—eh, general?"

"Four months! I should think not, by Jupiter!" returned the general, rubbing his nose pleasantly. "One doesn't hear good singing as often as that, my dear boy. "I'll just tell you," he continued, turning to Beatrix, "a thing my dear old friend Dorimar said to me once"——

"Was Professor Dorimar a friend of yours?" exclaimed Beatrix, with sunshine streaming from her eyes.

"Well, I guess it was a good while before you was born that I knew him first," said the general gallantly; "and there was nobody had much to say about music after him!"

"Oh, I'll sing for you as much as you wish!" rejoined the young lady, all alive with generous pleasure. "Thinking of Professor Dorimar always makes me feel as if I could do anything." She led the way, as she spoke, to the inner sitting room, the scene of her late battle with Mr. Vinal. The gentlemen followed, and Jocelyn took the opportunity to murmur to Inigo, "What do you think of her?"

"If she could sing as she looks," responded that personage, "I'd never bother my head again about the Russian. The funny thing is this gal looks a little as the Russian would like to, if she could. But the beauties can't do anything but look beautiful, as a rule. Well, we'll see. I might like to have her for opera bouffe, anyhow."

"Were you on the southern side during the war, general?" inquired Mr. Randolph, as they sat down.

"Humph! my commission was an English one," the general replied, with military presence of mind. "Hadn't the luck to see your country till after the racket was over." Here he endeavored to catch Jocelyn's eye, in order to relieve his own feelings by a wink, but at that moment Beatrix's fingers touched the keys, and thenceforward nothing was possible but to listen.

It need not be asked what she sang on this momentous occasion. Her method and quality would have been apparent in almost any selection. But the phases of emotion through which she had recently passed were surging toward that expression which only music can afford, and with deep drawn breath and exultant heart she launched into a passage from one of those grand works of the last century which all the intellectual brilliance and pictorial complexity of the modern gospel of music cannot supplant nor outweigh.

As the mighty strains won control of the listeners' senses all things seemed to undergo a noble transformation. There was a feeling of enlargement and exaltation, what was trifling and ignoble faded out of sight, or was absorbed into the prevailing harmony of ordered beauty. Passion gained majesty from restraint. Sorrow throbbed with the delight of joy, and joy assumed the dignity of sorrow. The mystic unity of art, which grasps the elements of things, and gives them speech and meaning; the utterance of the divine reason, which transcends the bondage of words; the language that belongs to no man, but to mankind—this magic and mystery of song, flowing forth in its grandeur and enchantment from a simple girl's throat, cast over all a spell of wonder and delight, and but for the profound warrant of its beauty would have seemed miraculous.

The room in which the auditors sat appeared to assume finer proportions; the very chairs and tables were endowed with elegance, and the persons themselves were conscious of a certain statelliness in their attitudes and movements, and of being uplifted to a higher sphere of thought and feeling than was native to them. And the singer was transfigured; for the music which touched the others as it were from without was made the very form and fiber of her soul. It magnified and strengthened her; it annulled the merely individual and accidental limitations of her being, and brought her into that large, impersonal state which marks the artist in seasons of inspiration. So was it with the pythoness of old, who, in such measure as her private personality was subdued and obliterated by the god, took on the god's own superhuman guise of majesty. Beatrix, when she sang, rose above Beatrix, and became the fearless and self unconscious instrument of her art's expression. Whatever reverence and dignity belonged to music belonged in such moments to the musician, and she bestowed the faculty of reverence upon those who were before incapable of it.

The general had at first put on a strictly critical air, as of one to whom pleasures and social amenities are one thing, and very well in their place, but business quite another. After two or three minutes, however, he had forgotten all about everything except the rise and fall, the swell and resonance, the airy gambolings and the strong, melodious poise and movement of this matchless voice. There is a point in the enjoyment of art where we cease to draw comparisons, and only feel that we are following the artist's charmed footsteps into hitherto unexplored regions of beauty and fascination. Our burden of responsibility falls from our shoulders because we are conscious that what we now see or hear is better than anything we have heretofore known. This recognition of true mastery, wherever and whenever met with, is among the surest signs of knowledge and experience. A fool will find fault with Raphael, and chat through a symphony by Beethoven.

Gen. Inigo was not a fool. He was a vulgar Jew, of uncertain nationality, whose past history and private life would not bear examination, but he knew what music and musical genius are, and he could estimate accurately the rarity and value of the discovery which Jocelyn had led him to make. Accidents aside, this unknown and unsuspecting girl would be one of the great prime donne of the world. It was not a matter of opinion, but of certainty. Indeed the general flattered himself that no one beside himself and Dorimar would be able to understand how great she really was.

As he sat there and listened to her, with his fat hands folded on his waistcoat, his stumpy little feet crossed one over the other, and his big head wagging and swaying in involuntary accord with the splendid diapason of sound, he was happier than he had ever been in his life. Not only was his reputation saved, his outlay secured, and his revenge on the Russian made certain, but his name would go down to posterity as that of the man who had brought before the world the brightest operatic star of the age. "I'll do the handsome thing by her—I will, by Jupiter!" thought the general to himself. "There are cases in which generosity pays 50 per cent., and here's one of 'em."

Beatrix sang for the better part of an hour, and might have gone on indefinitely, so far as either she or her auditors were concerned, for a truly noble voice rightly trained and managed is as tireless and untiring as it is beautiful. But mortal existence is full of petty lets and hindrances, and Beatrix, being for the present a hostess as well as prima donna assoluta, was obliged to go and see about the supper. When the gentlemen were alone the general pulled down his waistcoat, sat up in his chair, and after regarding Jocelyn for a few moments between half closed eyelids nodded his head several times slowly.

"I see you are fond of music, general," said Mr. Randolph discerningly.

"Well, music and I are under some obligations to each other," was the general's reply. "Now, just tell me, has that young lady ever sung in public?"

"My daughter ever sung in public!" exclaimed the young lady's father, with the air of a prince of the blood. "We are not that sort of people, sir!"

"Come now, Randolph, this is between friends, you know," said Jocelyn, smiling as one who is superior to prejudice. "Great gifts like hers—deuce take it, you've no right to hide 'em! We're not living in the feudal ages; what's the good of a girl's being talented if nobody's to know anything about it? Besides, talent means money nowadays, and your daughter's voice is a fortune if it's rightly managed. Don't you agree with me, general?"

"Well, a great deal depends on the management," returned that gentleman, squeezing his large nose between his thumb and forefinger. "But with good management — yes — she could make money, as much as she wants."

"I should say she could, as much as she wants, or as much as you want either, Randolph, if these stories I hear about your embarrassments have any truth in 'em."

"I scarcely understand; perhaps you will explain yourself more fully," said Randolph, looking from one to the other in a manner that betrayed agitation.

"I see you don't know who Inigo is," observed Jocelyn suavely. "You've made such a hermit of yourself up here of late years you've dropped out of the running. Why, Inigo, my dear man—simple as you see him sit there—is the foremost impresario and musical manager of the age. He has heard a report of our Beatrix's powers, and—well, go ahead, Inigo; put it in your own way."

"I'll just tell you what it is, Mr. Randolph," said the impresario, assuming the reins of the conversation with a wave of the hand. "A few words are best, when it's about business. I came up here to find out if your daughter could sing as good as Jocelyn here says she could. Well, she's got a fine organ, and she knows what to do with it; no mistake about that! Well, I've got an opening and I'll take her in, and I'll pay her first prices; that's what I'll do. She goes right on, in opera, under me, and she makes her fortune; that's all about it! I'm a square man, by Jupiter! and I don't make no fuss about terms; when I buy a good article I pay good money for it. When I say I'll make her a boom I'll do it. When Moses Inigo says he'll do the management the young lady's all right, if she was as homely as a cow and sung like a bull; and if she gets a fool to manage her, or manages herself (it's about the same thing), she might sing like an angel and look like Venus and not make fifty dollars a week, and don't you forget it!"

"I am not accustomed, I need hardly say," observed Randolph, with an appealing glance at Jocelyn, and endeavoring to appear calm and indifferent, "to consider or discuss such matters. I have always lived, as my forefathers have before me, upon my private resources, without reference to trade of any sort. However, gentlemen, I must admit that fortune has played me a very scurvy trick, through no fault of my own; and I suppose that what you say is true—the good old days are passing away, and each one of us has to fight for his own hand. At the same time it could only be with the greatest reluctance, and under pressure of the severest necessity, that I could permit a daughter of mine"——

"To be—of course—that's understood!" put in Jocelyn comfortably. "But you'll be surprised to find how little annoyance there is about it, especially since, in your case, it very fortunately happens that we shall be able to put Beatrix upon the stage without any one's being aware who she is. She will be incognita from first to last."

"Ah! that changes the aspect of the matter materially," said Randolph, looking at the impresario. "But it occurs to me that"——

The entrance of Beatrix herself at this juncture prevented the thing which had occurred to her father from becoming known. She announced that supper was ready. The gentlemen arose, and Jocelyn, approaching her, took her hand and put it under his arm, murmuring confidentially in her ear, "How would our little Beatrix like to pay all her father's debts, and set up the family on its legs again?"

Beatrix gazed round at him with searching eyes and questioning lips. The unruly part of her excitement had been composed by her singing, but the exalted mood remained, so that she was ready to expect anything that was not commonplace. She could not have told what Jocelyn meant, and yet she seemed to herself to anticipate what he was going to say. Good news was in the air. However, for the moment nothing more was said. Her father was behind, with the general, and they were speaking in an undertone. Her heart beat high, and her step was light. As they came to the supper table, and Jocelyn pressed her hand, she gave him a smile which, had he been worthy of it, would have knighted him on the spot. She was young and knew nothing worse than her own pure self, and she was ready to give gratitude without waiting to know for what her gratitude was due. Experience of the world is apt to correct this impulse.

The conversation at table wandered first over miscellaneous topics, for Mr. Randolph was somewhat at a loss how to present the all important subject to his daughter; Jocelyn was busy thinking over his own part in the little comedy, and the impresario, besides finding much to occupy his attention in the viands, was now wholly at ease in his own mind and dreamed of no difficulties. He had interpreted Mr. Randolph's scruples as merely a bid for good payment, to which he had responded in his usual whole souled style; as to the young lady, of course she would follow her father's lead. Of the three it was Jocelyn who first spoke.

"I don't see why we should keep this dear child any longer in ignorance of the plot we have hatched against her," he said, addressing the others, but keeping his eyes caressingly on Beatrix. "My dear girl, I said I brought you fame and fortune; but, in fact, I only brought you the opportunity to win them for yourself. You have a glorious future before you. This gentleman is the owner and manager of the new opera house in the city. All your favorite operas will be produced there this season, splendidly set and cast, and you, my dear Beatrix, are to sing the leading music."

Beatrix grew pale, and turned her face toward her father. "Oh, papa, can I?" she said in a low voice.

"It is painful, of course, to contemplate such a thing," Mr. Randolph replied, looking down in his plate with an uneasy, evasive air; "but we are poor folks now, you know, and we must do the best we can. We can only hope, my dear, that the necessity will not"——

"Oh, but it is not that!" exclaimed the girl, interrupting him, and tremulous with excitement; "but to sing, papa—to sing in real opera before a real audience! It is the best thing in the world! But can I do it, do you think? Am I able? Would Professor Dorimar have wished it? I would rather"—she was going to say "marry Mr. Vinal," but changed it to, "I would rather do anything than disgrace Professor Dorimar."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The average length of life is greater in Norway than in any other country on the globe. This is attributed to the fact that the temperature is cool and uniform throughout the year.

If we only knew it, we are revealing unconsciously all the while to outsiders the inner workings of our nature through the sign manual of hair, eyes, hands and mouth.

CROSSING THE ATLANTIC

Usually involves sea sickness. When the waves play pitch and toss with you, strong indeed must be the stomach that can stand it without revolting. Tourists, commercial travelers, yachtsmen, mariners, all testify that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is the best remedy for the nausea experienced in rough weather on the water. Nervous and weak travelers by land often suffer from something akin to this, and find in the bitters its surest remedy. No disorder of the stomach, liver or bowels is so obstinate that it may not be overcome by the prompt and thorough remedy. Equally efficacious is it for chills and fever, kidney and rheumatic trouble and nervousness. Emigrants to the frontier should provide themselves with this fine medicinal safeguard against the effects of vicissitudes of climate, hardship, exposure and fatigue.

Economy is good, they say,
But it is hard to learn it;
Instead of lopping off your pay,
I'd rather have you earn it.

A COMMON SENSE HOUSEKEEPER.

No one is better qualified to speak in regard to what is useful in family life than Marion Harland. In her popular and valuable book, "Eve's Daughters or Common Sense for Maid, Wife and Mother," on pages 103 and 445, she says:

"For the aching back—should it be slow in recovering its normal strength—an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER is an excellent comforter, combining the sensation of the sustained pressure of a strong warm hand with certain tonic qualities developed in the wearing. It should be kept over the seat of uneasiness for several days—in obstinate cases for perhaps a fortnight.

"For pain in the back wear an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER constantly, renewing as it wears off. This is an invaluable support when the weight on the small of the back becomes heavy and the aching incessant."

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

By local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

SWALLOW SONG.

Oh, to feel the wild thrill of the swallow—
The wonder of the wing—
On the soft, blue billows of air to follow
The summer and soar to sing!

To drink blue air and feel it flowing
Through every dainty plume;
Uplifting, pillowing, bearing, blowing,
And the earth below in bloom.

Is it far to heaven, O swallow, swallow?
The heavy hearted sings;
I watch thy flight and I long to follow
The while I wait for wings.
—Anna B. Averill in Boston Woman's Journal.

THE LAST TROUT.

Cold river was rising, and the growing volume of its flood poured into the Racquette with swirls and eddies and strong rushing sounds. The bend of the greater river received the whirling waters and joined them to its own strong current, which spun a mighty eddy from bank to bank. On the great rock at the edge of the pool stood the trapper, in one hand his rod, in the other his landing net, while a large trout patched the gray rock with its glorious color at his feet.

"He'll weigh three pounds ef he'll weigh an ounce," said the trapper as his eyes rested admiringly on the catch, "and the thickness of him shows he's had good feed in. The Lord puts the same colors into rainbows and stormy sunrises, but nowhere else, as I conceit. But how he can put so much of the glory of the upper world into the cold depths of the lower and keep it all aglow there is more than I can understand. Yis, one fish be enough," continued the old man reflectively as he scanned the whirling water as if longing to make one more cast. "I sartinly believe the one that rose fust was a pound heavier than this one, but one fish be enough for a Christian man, especially of he be shaped and colored as this one is," and the old trapper proceeded to gather his flies to his reel.

It was then that his ear caught the sound of a step coming down the trail toward the rock on which he stood—a soft, quiet, leisurely footfall, as of one who strolls errandless onward, unhurried by duty and wrapped perchance in grave or pleasant meditation. In a moment a man of venerable appearance came to the edge of the river and gazed in placid contemplation at the swirling stream. He was tall in stature and spare as to his habit. His face had the scholar's paleness and his shoulders the scholar's stoop. In one hand he carried a small volume and in the other a spray of cedar he had evidently plucked from some overhanging bough as he came down the trail. He was dressed in a suit of black cloth, and his necktie was as spotlessly white as his linen. A close fitting skullcap of velvet rested on his snowy locks.

He spied the trapper, and approaching him said in a finely modulated tone, "If I am not mistaken this is John Norton, the trapper?"

"Yis, I be John Norton," replied the old man, "and I have trapped a good deal off and on fo the last seventy year. And who be ye?"

"I am a clergyman," said the other pleasantly, "and in the city where I preach they call me the Rev. Dr. Davenport."

He held out his hand in a formal but courteous manner.

The latter took the pale, thin hand in his own strong palm and shook it heartily, saying:

"I am glad to see ye face to face and nigh by, reverend sir, for I remember hearing ye four summers agone up at St. Regis. Ye was preaching from a text, 'Woe be to ye Pharisees,' and though I couldn't git into the parlors owing to the crowds of city folks that filled them and had to hear what I did through a winder, yet I managed to get the line of yer talk, and the way ye warmed them Pharisees made me feel comfortable in my mind, for the Pharisees of the Scriptur' be very like the thievin half breeds and vagabonds that steal an honest trapper's skins in the woods, and I have spent a good deal of powder and lead in edicatin the knaves toward righteousness when I have ketched them pilferin on the line of my traps."

"Well, well!" exclaimed the old doctor, evidently pleased that his companion had heard him deliver one of his most celebrated discourses and so warmly approved it. "Well, well! I am glad to meet you and that I may almost call you one of my parishioners, John Norton," and the doctor rubbed his white, thin hands together and laughed a decorous and good natured little laugh.

"I don't know as I ketch the full meanin of yer words," responded the trapper, "for I have never been caught in the churches of the settlements and know leetle of their agreements or their differences, but I sartinly conceit that ye had the right of it techin them Pharisees, and that you and I will stand side by side in the day of jedgment and tell the Lord what we know of their divilments, whether they lived a thousand year agone in Judee or was sneakin around the woods when I was on the arth."

"Good gracious!" screamed the doctor, "where did that monstrous trout come from?"

"From the Lord, parson; yis, straight from the Lord," answered the trapper promptly. "As straight as a brown hackle, a 9-foot leader, an old bamboo rod and a good grip at the butt of the rod could bring him. Do you know how to make a cast for a 4-pounder yerself, parson?"

"No, no!" exclaimed the old doctor of divinity. "That is," he continued, "it is long years since I have allowed myself to touch a rod or gun for fear of the consequences."

"Consequences?" returned the trapper. "I don't understand ye."

"No, I know you cannot," replied the other. "How can a man of your manner of life understand it? But a man of my calling, trapper, should not even have the appearance of evil or allow himself to fall into the least semblance or worldliness, much less to allow the pleasures of this world to fasten their grip upon him, and as a young man I was excitable—very excitable—and I loved to shoot and row and fish, loved the sports of blood and field, as they are called. Yea, trapper, I loved them like a sinner, and so, to avoid even the appearance of evil and overcome the riotous motions of nature within me, I broke away from all the exercises that were so wildly exciting and joyous to my nature, and"—and here the old doctor's voice shook—"it is forty years since this hand has grasped a rod or this finger put its pressure on a trigger."

"Heavens and 'arth!" exclaimed the trapper. "What a useless life ye must have lived."

"It seems so to you, I dare say," cried the doctor. "But placed as I was— Why, John Norton, when I had been twenty years in the ministry it was regarded as a deadly sin for a clergyman to skate or slide down hill, or shoot a rifle, and in the winter months, when the snow lay soft on the hills and the clouds were as lead and the air hollow, I have locked myself in my chamber and buried my head in the pillows that I might not hear the glorious music of the hounds as they raced, noses breast high, after the flying game."

"Friend," said the trapper, "ye have done injustice to yer natur, that fine natur the Lord give ye at birth, and sold yer birthright of happiness for a mess of miserable pottage. Ye have fed yer feelins on husks when the plenty and merriment of yer father's house was open to ye. Here, take the rod, take the rod, I say, and let yer old fingers feel the heft of it, and yer ears hear the whirr of the reel once more,' and the trapper literally thrust the rod into the white hand of his hesitant companion.

But oh, the change that came to the old minister as his tapering fingers closed on the polished butt. He fairly caressed the reel with his white, thin hands, his eyes lighted as he poised it as for a cast, his form straightened and his left foot was pushed forward; a fine flush glowed through the pallor of his cheek; he seized the leader and with a wide sweep of his hand drew a dozen yards from the reel and laughed a low, happy laugh at the singing thereof.

"Make a cast, make a cast," cried the trapper. "Lengthen the line, and make a cast to the far edge of the pool where yon bubbles be in line. If the Lord sends ye the trout he ought to send ye, he will take twenty years from yer head to the bottom of the river with him."

Then and there, on the ledge that juts into the Racquette's tide just below the mouth of Cold river, did the church of common sense become incarnate. As Ole Bull would stand posed before the expectant thousands when he lifted his bow, so vibrant, erect, graceful, stood the old divine ready for the cast. In an instant came the motion of the arm, the turn of the wrist that all anglers know but no words may describe, and up went the flies into the air, flew backward and then shot straight out over the whirling tide. Downward they floated, lighted like vagrant feathers amid the bubbles, and——

"Salvation!" screamed the doctor. "A trout!" A trout such as is rarely seen hung in air three good feet above the flies and bubbles. Tail flat and big as a shingle, mouth open, belly red as a stormy sunrise, fins like a rainbow, the huge sides dotted with shot of reddest rose—so hung in full sight for a moment above the dark stream, then fell with a mighty flash and was gone!

"Cast agin, cast agin at the same spot and if he lifts, strike quick and strike hard, in honor of the rod and the pool and yer boyhood days, and be hanged to the Pharisees," yelled the trapper.

Oh, the passage of time! Oh, the burden of years! Oh, the cares and the troubles that whiten the head! How they fade! How they fall! How they fly from us, friends, when we stand, rod in hand, on the edge of a deep, whirling pool, with a trout such as that in the depths, waiting for the beautiful lure which he has in his eagerness missed!

Oh, the cast that the old doctor made and the answer that flashed from the depths! The nervous old wrist struck quick and struck true, the twisted silk shrunk to the strain and the water flew in fine mist from the braids, so strong was the stroke and so heavy the fish. Then down, downward he plunged, full of force, full of fire, a line breaker, a rod smasher is he, and through the strong, swirling current he tears like a submarine bolt fired to kill.

See the line cut the water! See the rod sway and quiver! Hear the shrill cry of the reel; see the old minister's face, the flush of the cheek, the gleam in the eye, the set look of the mouth, the white hair flying free. Then see the great fish on the bank, the two white headed men bending over it; hear their laughter, see their clasped hands, see the old divine fling a caper like the flourish that precedes the jig, and the green balsams and pines, and through their dark branches patches and spaces of blue sky. Can you not see the picture and sketch—you, brother angler—that hangs in my memory over the big ledge on the Racquette, just below where the cool current of Cold river flows in?

Many things have we lost and many changes have come to me, as to thee, with the years. Faces which were to our eyes like stars to dark skies have faded from sight; voices whose greetings and farewells made music to our ears sound no more, and hands that clasped ours warm and true we in the throng of today reach for in vain, seek and find not. But the rivers on which we boated, the lakes where we camped, the streams that we fished, the hills and the mountains, the lilies and wild roses, the green, fragrant trees, the still, lonely camps that we made years ago—these we see as of old. These memory holds dear and hangs high in her hall, and dearer they grow as our heads get white and our eyes grow dim, while our sun reddens to its setting, and that gloaming which we trust will bring forth anew the sweet stars that have faded, as we sit hoping and waiting, comes silently on.—W. H. H. Murray in New York World.

A Remedy That Failed.

There is a man in Harlem who has a much respected aunt. This aunt is wealthy and eccentric. She came to live with this Harlem resident, and having been reared in the country and having recently come from there she missed the rural hum of insects and the agricultural noises of a country residence.

Being anxious to please his relative and make her reconciled to city life, this Harlem man hired a number of boys to secure crickets for him. He bought 20 cans of crickets and turned them out to pasture in his back yard. For several nights the cheerful chirping of the crickets proved very soothing to the aged aunt. The various cats in the neighborhood soon became aware of the unusual number of crickets in this back yard. Cats are fond of crickets, and now the Harlem man has cats and not crickets in his back yard. He says that all the cats in Harlem have made his yard a trysting place, and the aunt threatens to move back into the country.—New York Herald.

A Little Conversation.

Nat Goodwin has a slight impediment in his speech. Henry Guy Carleton, who is the author of one of Mr. Goodwin's comedies, has a still more marked peculiarity of this kind. The other day Carleton came up to Goodwin and said:

"H-h-have you anything to do f-f-for the next t-t-two hours?"

"N-no," replied Goodwin. "W-why do you ask?"

"B-b-because if you have a c-c-couple of hours to spare I'd like f-fi-five minutes' conversation with you."—St. Louis Republic.

ENJOYING A MEAL.

A Woman Who Knows the Right Way to Make Eating Enjoyable.

A HINT TO MANY HOUSEWIVES.

No Formality, No Stiffness, but Just Sociability and Perfect Ease—It Aids Digestion.

I must tell you about a delightful dinner which I lately enjoyed with some friends in a suburban villa of Boston.

In the first place, dinner was on time. I do not know any more annoying and fretting affair than irregularity of meals. A housekeeper who has no sense of time and has no regard for the instincts of her family is thoroughly selfish. The stomach calls out at regular periods, and if then it is put off and irritated the subconscious animal functions become very conscious and finally greedy.

In the family to which I refer there was a certain time when we were expected to be prepared for dinner. The family and friends gathered in gradually from their walks and rides and work, and without exacting precision the hour of 1 found us within call.

The second point to be noted was the absence of formality. We quietly strolled into the dining room, unburdened with ceremony. But there was no lack of refinement and civility. We sat down without rudeness, but with the best of good cheer. I think the most annoying etiquette is that of the table. There are families where I am welcomed who crush me with politeness. I am afraid to sit down before the rest, or to touch the food on my plate until a signal is given. But somehow here my hostess had me at once engaged in a little chat on a topic that took me far away from dining and food. She covered the few moments of gathering with the nicest art of conversation. Attention was not drawn to the table, but taken away from it. Unconsciously we were all in place, and unconsciously were engaged in eating fruit. Then some glorious color of melon or currants or peaches drew the eye and mind, and we were led into a delightful realization of the delicious flavors that touched our palates. But all this was a complex sensation. We felt not only the flavors, but we saw the beauties. Dining was aesthetic, intellectual as well as physical.

The third charm of the dinner at my friend's was that there were no formal courses. Do you know what horrible things are these stiff and numbered courses? There was something on the table before we arrived; and quite enough to make sure that every one would be able to find that which pleased. When any one seemed to be through her plate was slipped away by an attentive servant, and with clean plates other foods were quietly offered. The variety was sufficient, and no one was compelled to sit playing with a fork or spoon while his or her neighbors finished a course. Easy conversation went on, and the eye of the noble hostess while very observant was never meddlesome.

But as a fourth delight there was no hurry. I notice that when people go to the table simply to eat they tumble down a great deal of food as if into a pot or jar. The result is the stomach is made at once concious that it is a slave and must do an enormous amount of hard work. It generally refuses. I never knew after dinner at Mrs. S.'s that I had been eating, nor did I ever have any consciousness about digestion. It is exceedingly disagreeable to have our unconscious faculties made conscious, for that is sure to end in dyspepsia. But here at my friends, when we were through dinner, we were through—that is, we had no indigestible compounds to torture us. Our stomachs were never thought of. Mainly we had not hurried because the dining had not been a purely physical process.

There were no personalities. It is awful to be singled out at table and have your queerness all paraded. Every one has idiosyncrasies of taste, and has a right to them, but when the hostess says: "You don't eat butter, do you? Why not? Don't you think butter is healthy?" she draws attention to your private business, and eating gets to be awkward—unless indeed you are egotistical enough to like to be talked about, or, worse yet, to talk about yourself, and then you soon get to be a nuisance. No, whatever you do, do not parade your oddities of eating, and do not encourage your hostess in doing it. On the whole, the articles of food on the table make a poor topic for conversation. My friend had a delicate way of tripping any bad tendency of the sort. I do not know what we were talking about all the time, but it was all so pleasant we barely knew we were eating.

Then there was an atmosphere of friendliness about the table. But of that I cannot talk. Who knows how to describe that exquisite flavor of good will that makes the best part of the life of a true family? Each one kissed the mother as they came in, and not with formality, I assure you. And we went out feeling that our first end in life was not to eat, but that a right sort of dinner was a glorious affair.—Mary E. Spencer in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

We Live Too Rapidly.

"I have solved a mystery that has puzzled me a great deal since I landed in New York," remarked Mr. J. Strothart, of Yorkshire, England. "A great many Americans one meets in England say that they have been sent there for six months or a year by the order of their physician. I never understood it before, but during the few days I have been in the country it has been made quite plain. The people go about at such high pressure that there is no wonder they break down. Such rushing and tearing about as can be seen in New York in the most uncomfortable weather is remarkable. Every man seems to be driven at his highest speed. In the west I understand the ways of the business men are even more rapid. Do your people realize that they cannot last long at that rate, or do they prefer short lives at top speed? This is the most beautiful country, but the people do not seem to take time to appreciate it."—Washington Post.

What Might Have Been.

Some Manchester men were discussing Darwin the other day, when one of them less learned than the rest exclaimed:

"Darwen, I kna that place. A've been there monny a toime."

"Get out, you fool!" said another. "We're nut talkin about the place called Darwen, but the mon. Hevn't ye nivver heerd o' Darwen? Why, if it hadn't been for Darwen, we s'ould all hev been chatterin monkeys and nut gentlemen like we are."—New York Tribune.

The Oriflamb.

The Carlovingian standard was really no other than the oriflamb, which has played so conspicuous a part in French history, but was not formally adopted until 1082, in the reign of Philip I. It consisted of a red or crimson flag, mounted on a gilded staff, the flag being cut into three "vandykes," to represent "tongues of fire," with a silken tassel between each.

The old romance writers pretended that the infidel was blinded by merely looking upon it. In the "Roman de Garin" the Saracens are made to exclaim, "If we only see it, we shall be dead men," and Froissart affirms that as soon as it was unfurled at Rosbecque the fog vanished from the French line of battle, leaving their enemies still shrouded in darkness.

Thus red, the color which the church has consecrated to her martyrs, became in its turn the color of the French kings. They wore it on their coats of arms through the whole period of the crusades, and as late as the closing decade of the fourteenth century were still faithful to this "glorious blazon."

The famous Du Guesclin, fighting against our English chivalry in Poitou, wore the red cross, while his adversaries wore the white. But after the great defeat at Agincourt, in 1415, the French kings abandoned the oriflamb, because it had been assumed by Henry V and his successors, and adopted white as a national color when England had discarded it. This is a curious but little known historical fact.—All the Year Round.

The Old English Post.

Under the direction of Cotton and Frankland (1690-1705) the operations of the postoffice largely increased. Cross posts were established; the posts themselves were farmed out to men of energy and capacity, who paid a share of the profits to the chief office, and under their sagacious administration the service was improved and extended. New packet boats of considerable speed were constructed by the king's order, under the guidance of Edmund Dummer, surveyor of the navy.

For him, as for the other pioneers of progress in early days, connection with the civil service proved disastrous. He lost his boats, his private property was mortgaged and foreclosed, and he died "bankrupt and broken hearted."

During this same period posts were established in North America, and for some time an ocean penny postage existed between our country and that colony. A reformer called Povey set on foot a halfpenny post in London, and the letters were collected by men in his employ, who rang bells to announce their approach. Povey was soon dispossessed of this arrangement, but letters continued to be collected by the sound of bells in London until 1846 and in Dublin down to September, 1859.—London Academy.

Presence of Mind in the Pulpit.

Frederick the Great, being informed of the death of one of his chaplains, a man of considerable learning and piety, determined to select a successor with the same qualifications and took the following method of ascertaining the merit of one of the numerous candidates for the appointment. He told the applicant that he would furnish him with a text the following Sunday, when he was to preach at the royal chapel. The morning came, and the chapel was crowded to excess.

The king arrived at the end of the prayers, and on the candidate ascending the pulpit he was presented with a sealed paper by one of his majesty's aids-de-camp. The preacher opened it and found nothing written. He did not, however, lose his presence of mind, but turning the paper on both sides he said:

"My brethren, here is nothing, and there is nothing. Out of nothing God created all things," and proceeded to deliver a most eloquent discourse on the wonders of the creation.—Sala's Journal.

The Story of a Crest.

There is a curious tradition concerning the almost miraculous preservation of the life of the first Earl of Kildare, which explains the origin of the crest used by the Offaly Geraldines. While an infant, so the record runs, he was in the castle of Woodstock, when an alarm of fire was raised. In the confusion that ensued the child was forgotten, and on the servants returning to search for him the room in which he lay was found in ruins. Soon after a strange voice was heard in one of the towers, and on looking up they saw an ape, which was usually kept chained, carefully holding the child in his arms. The earl afterward, in gratitude for his preservation, adopted a monkey for his crest.—London News.

MISFIT DRESSES.

A Shop in New York Where They Can Always be Purchased.

GOWNS ORDERED AND NOT PAID FOR

How the Shopkeeper Obtains Them—Women who Come Home From Abroad Financially Short.

New York women cannot vote, more's the pity, but it is the sole remaining prerogative that men have a cinch on. Women do and have everything else that back in the Dark Ages was considered the exclusive privilege of the lords of creation. Here is an instance:

Until recently men had a monopoly of misfit clothing. Not so now, for very lately a person—whether male or female does not appear on the otherwise explicit sign, but manifestly a progressive person who keeps up with the procession—has started a ladies' misfit clothing store. This shop is situated, appropriately enough, in the heart of the Tenderloin precinct. Everything new or bizarre finds its way instinctively to the Tenderloin district. In the window is an alluring blue and gold ball dress, with slippers to match, and a gold bouquet holder, which is, as the clerk tells you, "not absolutely indispensable for a ball costume, but considered tasty and stylish."

The clerk is a small girl with a persuasive smile and a cold in her head. She has the useful knack of adaptability, for when I declined to examine the ball dress she called my attention to a mink muff and boa quite good naturedly, and declared that they would make me look very jaunty.

All around the walls are hung dresses of every kind and description, while piled on the counters are jackets, ulsters and that species of meal bag known as "wrap."

But these goods are secondhand, and can be bought at any good secondhand shop. It is necessary to carry such a line of goods, since there is a demand for them, but this is merely a side issue. If you scorn to wear the castoff garments of your fellow women and desire something new you can pass behind the portieres which divide the outer shop from the inner one and repose yourself on a plush sofa while the clerk spreads before you garments of every variety, all new and in the latest style.

"How is it you get these dresses?" I ask the clerk. "I thought a woman would undergo any amount of standing and fitting to get a dress right at last."

"So they will," she replies, "we do not get dresses because the people who throw them back on the dressmaker's hands are not pleased with the set of the dress. It is because they cannot pay for them. You see, a woman goes to the dressmaker and orders a dress—quite an expensive one. She furnishes nothing whatever. The dressmaker furnishes everything and takes the risk of her paying for it. In some places it is customary to make a deposit, but not everywhere. Well, the dress is finished. Milady finds that she has not as much money as she had the day she ordered the gown, and so she can't pay for it. She throws it back on the modiste's hands, forfeiting the deposit, if there has been one. Well, the dressmaker has to do the best she can. In order to prevent the gown being a dead loss she sells it to us. And here it is, just as good as if you had ordered it yourself, and much cheaper.

"Then there is another way in which we get dresses. Lots of women buy a quantity of clothes abroad, a great many at a time, because they get them cheap. They find when they get back that they don't want some of them, or they are a little hard up after the expenses of traveling, and they sell them to us."

"Do you buy many things from actresses?"

"Oh, no, indeed, hardly any. You see, they always need the clothes they order, and so there is little chance of their throwing them back on the dressmaker's hands."

Then the little clerk begins to haul down the dresses from the hooks. There is one of exquisite lace made over an underskirt of ashes of roses silk. The waist is an elaborate affair with jet butterflies on the shoulders, a jet bodice and a heavy fringe of jet and ribbons to finish the bottom of the waist. The waistband is stamped with the name of a fashionable modiste. You can buy this dress for twenty-five dollars. The jet on the waist alone never cost a penny less than forty dollars.

Here is a smart brown dress of heavy broadcloth made with a severely stylish coat, its only ornamentation being the large buttons which secure it. There is an English look about the dress, and you are not surprised to find inside the name of a well known tailor in Regent street.

Hanging next to it is a confection in dark green velvet and bengaline silk, lightened by judicious touches of a beautiful pink and green brocade. This dress was made in Paris, and was sold to the misfit clothing people for reasons of a pecuniary nature.

You can buy a gown of rough gray and blue cloth trimmed with plain blue for twelve dollars. A gray bedford cord with smart black braid trimmings comes at fourteen dollars. And so on through the department. You can buy a buttercup gauze dinner dress or a blue flannel yachting suit. You can get a gown for church or a peignoir to say your prayers at home in.

And whatever you buy you can do it with the gratifying feeling that no man living can ever look down upon you from the misfit clothing standpoint again.—New York Recorder.

A Dressmaking Club.

Among the many clubs of women having for their aim almost every purpose under the sun, one that is as unique as it has been successful is an amateur dressmaking club. A number of young wives who had become dissatisfied with the high prices and poor work of their dressmakers formed themselves into a club for the purpose of working out the problem of making their own gowns. At first they confined their work to tea gowns and common dresses. At their meetings they gave one another the benefit of their taste and experience. One had a knowledge of fitting; one a good eye for color; another could drape, and still another could trim, and the dresses evolved by their joint efforts were much more tasteful and in every way more satisfactory than if made by any one of them. After a time they made their best dresses in the club, and there grew up a friendly rivalry as to which of them should plan the prettiest dress at the least expense, which rivalry was productive of some astonishingly cheap and pretty frocks.—Chicago News.

COLLECTING DEBTS IN FRANCE.

Points of Difference Between the System There and In This Country.

The matter practiced in the collection of debts in France and in the United States does not differ materially save in the collection and the mode of procedure. The first step which is necessary for a creditor in France to take before he can use legal means to collect a debt due him is to obtain judgment against the debtor, which is rendered by a justice of the peace, provided the amount does not exceed $40. The defendant is required to appear in court on a certain day and arrange for a settlement of the account and pay a part or the whole of it or show cause why.

If this arrangement is not made, the defendant is a second time summoned to appear, and should he then flatly refuse payment judgment is rendered against him. The cost of judgment, together with that of the summons, is defrayed by the plaintiff and a copy of the former sent to the debtor. He then has three months' grace to appeal before a civil court from the judgment already handed down. Failing to exercise this privilege, the matter is put in the hands of a "huissier," whose functions partake of those of both the bailiff and process server, but his methods as well as his perogatives resemble neither one nor the other. The huissier upon request of the creditor makes an abstract statement of the condition of the debt, the fee for preparing and serving the same varying according to the length of the instrument and not according to the importance of the debt. Its average cost, however, may be placed at $2.50.

In case the debtor ignores the document an "assignation" is served upon him, and eight days thereafter his furniture is seized and placed in the hands of the huissier. The expense entailed in the preparation of these notices is defrayed by the creditor, but if at any moment the debtor agrees to liquidate in full he is not only required by law to discharge his original obligation, but to add to it the costs of the judgment and fees of the huissier. Whether this system is better than the plan pursued in the United States is a matter of opinion.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Patti's Fairyland.

Craig-y-nos castle, situated at the base of "The Rock of Night," one of the many high hills which stretch away from the Brecon Beacons toward Swansea bay, from which the diva's home takes its name, appears to the weary and footsore traveler (to whom a hearty meal and ample rest is never denied) to be as an oasis amid the desert plains. Built in the center of a wildly romantic expanse of scenery and traversed by the Tawe, a bright little river which hurries seaward, babbling and rippling as it flows, the castle stands resplendent, with an almost regal air, commanding an impressive view of the broad valley and its picturesque surroundings.

To the left of the chateau are situated the conservatories, vineries, peachhouses, etc., and last, but not least, the magnificent winter garden, which has lately been erected and stocked with rare palms and Australian ferns. Here the diva takes her daily walk when fierce gales and drenching showers deter her from braving the elements. The castle and winter garden are brilliantly illuminated by electric light, so that the effect of the cattle at night, when viewed from the somber valley, is that of an enchanted palace situated in Fairyland.—Woman at Home.

The Oldest Church.

The oldest Christian church in the world is at Rome. Not far from the great church of St. Maria Maggiore, in a street bearing the same name, is the much smaller church of St. Pudentiana, which tradition, as well as the opinion of archaeological experts, declares to be the most ancient of the Christian edifices of Rome.

About the middle of the first century a certain Roman senator named Pudens had a house on this spot. He was a Christian convert and, it is said, a distant relative of Paul the Apostle, who lodged with him from A. D. 41 to 50, and converted his two daughters, Praxedes and Pudentiana. For the religious uses of himself and guests he built a small chapel in this house, and when he died in 96 and his wife a year later his daughter added a baptistry, the plans for which were drawn by Pius, the then bishop of Rome. In course of time a church was erected on the site of the original house of Pudens and consecrated by the bishop in 108 or 145.—London Million.

Enlightened the Lawyer.

"I presume, my good fellow, you are a laborer?" said a lawyer to a plainly dressed witness.

"You are right. I am a workman, sir," replied the witness, who was a civil engineer.

"Familiar with the use of the pick, shovel and spade, I presume?"

"To some extent. Those are not the principal implements of my trade though."

"Perhaps you will condescend to enlighten me as to your principal implements?"

"It is hardly worth while. You don't understand their nature or use."

"Probably not," loftily, "but I insist on knowing what they are."

MILITANT PLANTS

They Look Like Prize Fighters and That's What They are.

SOME FIGHTERS IN THE PALM FAMILY

The Pandanus Reflexus Has a Row of Spines Which Pierce Like Needles—The Jim Corbett.

"All organic beings, without exception, tend to increase at so high a ratio that no district, no station, nor even the whole surface of the land or the whole ocean, would hold the progeny of a single pair after a certain number of generations. The inevitable result is an ever recurrent struggle for existence. It has truly been said that all nature is at war; the strongest ultimately prevail, the weakest fall." Something like this statement by the most celebrated of the naturalists will occur to the observant person without any skill in natural history who visits the Phipps conservatory and tries to make out the meanings of the curious features which so many of the plants present.

For instance, the big Pandanus reflexus, which no visitor will pass unnoticed. It has a militant look from the root up, its leaves or whatever they are to be called reminding one of the ancient two handed sword—that is, they do at first glance, but one must not trust that, or he will be deceived. The leaf is not like a sword blade; only half of it is. The whole leaf is of the shape of a half opened book. On each edge and along the center is a row of spines, which pierce like needles. It is endogenous—that is, increases by internal growth and elongation at the top and has no bark to strengthen and protect it. Judging from appearance, one of those long leaves would be easily broken by the push of an animal, and to keep animals at their distance it has sent out these spines, which guard it from three directions. A young animal which ran against them once would remember them the next time, just as calves and colts soon learn not to play close to a barbed wire fence. The pandanus, which is one of 50 species of a genus which inhabits tropical climes from Africa to Polynesia, as it sticks out its keen spines and threatens to puncture the hide of anything which comes near it, seems to say, like the Scotch thistle: "Nobody can monkey with me with impunity. I am a fighter." That is one reason why it is so big. It has made room for itself. In nature might is right—the weaker goes to the wall.

Some other fighters will be found in the palm house. One is easily found by its label, Latania barbonica, and it is particularly interesting in that it is an example of a plant protecting its young, if that is the way to say it. Three outer stalks, strong and well developed, each with its row of sharp spines, inclose and defend the tender central stalks. The leaf of a central stalk, one may see, is not allowed to pass the older stalks, lest it suffer damage. They keep it behind them as a mother might push her child behind her in time of danger. This young leaf is kept in leading strings until the stalk has grown so that it can reach out over the others and take care of itself. Meantime it will produce a set of spines and join the other stalks in the great fight which is to determine what plant is fittest to survive. The instinct of animals is wonderful, but the instinct of the plant is equally so. That may be seen in the larger latania, which states on its label that these palms were discovered in south China in 1818. It has developed a body, and in that at the base of the branches the fruit grows. Care must be taken of that, for if the seed is not ripened they will not reproduce, and the species will suffer to that extent. See the spines on those branches around where the fruit lies. Let an animal try to get into it, and he would come out with a sore hide. The plant would scratch him like a cat. The pandanus is erect, and so its spines stick straight out. It wants to prevent animals from pushing against it. The palm wants to protect its fruit, and so its spine points downward, as much as to say to a thief below, "You come up here, and I'll jab your eyes out." In still another palm, the great one just inside the main entrance to the conservatory, the spines are 8 inches long, look like stilettos and form a perfect cheval-de-frise. Man, with all his thinking how to make that obstruction to an enemy most complete, has not surpassed the genius of nature in so directing the points of these stilettos as to cover every possible approach. As a fighter this big Phenix spinosa is the Jim Corbett of the palmhouse, and it is great on style.

That is what some of the other fighters are not, as the cactuses. They take all sorts of shapes, in stature rising from creeping stems—though there is none so large in the conservatory—to trunks 30 feet high, but are neither beautiful when small nor majestic when great. They are too abominably stupid to put on style. But what should one expect of a plant which wild grows in hot, stony places and when cultivated is entirely happy in a sandy loam mixed with brick dust? One might as well expect style in those little black Italians of the pipe line, who have been reared on mush and cucumbers. And the pity of it is these cactuses are American from way back. Pretty nearly their only redeeming feature is that they can fight. Big or little, they are ready to do battle, unless it be those granddaddies with the long white hair, which, like many men, are aged looking without being venerable and make one think they had best betake themselves to another world for all the good they are doing in this. Whoever it was that put the cactuses and the sleepy and leather brained young alligators in the same house in the conservatory had an inspiration, for they surely go together. But that is not to say that these plants are uninteresting. Far from it. They offer many suggestions as to the humors of nature, and in their sphere they are useful. If they would only wake up and look alive! They seem doubly stupid to one who goes to them from the spirited plants in the other parts of the conservatory.—Pittsburg Times.

A Tramp's Problem.

A tramp having found a hen's feather in his travels about the city kept it until night, when he carefully placed it on the pavement in a back alley and slept upon it. Awaking next morning and looking scornfully upon the bit of down he exclaimed, "Gee wizz! if one feather is as hard to sleep on as that, what must a whole bedful be?"—Boston Courier.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, JULY 20 1894

Two California boards of trade have taken the position that the solution of the present disastrous state of affairs, ramifying in its destructive effects all over the United States, lies in arbitration. These bodies are of Oakland and San Jose respectively. It is absurd to assume that either party to the controversy has all the right on its side. All good citizens desire the presence of law and order in the community in which they live and these should be maintained at all hazards. But pretty nearly every controversy that arises amongst men is settled by compromise in some shape. When a federal judge takes the position that the people should seek a remedy for their real or fancied wrongs in the courts, he is, of course, standing on impregnable ground, and the public heartily endorses his course. But the fact is, that new conditions are constantly arising for which there is no precedent in the past. Trades unions and labor organizations are new problems, for whose adjustment the law has not fully provided. The quite general conviction of this fact is recognized by the boards of trade referred to.

In the case of railway matters such a method of settling the differences between employer and employee is imperative. It could be readily reached as to interstate commerce by amending the interstate commerce act. The several states would doubtless enact laws in sympathy with the federal statute. Either that or the government should become the absolute owner of the rail ways.

The most determined advocate of the capitalist side of the present dispute must be of a very sanguine temperament indeed if he thinks that a movement so strong as the present has demonstrated itself to be can be settled without concessions of some sort. The labor organizations of the United States have become colossal affairs. Their power to arrest business and disorganize commerce and all sorts of production has been already demonstrated. It would astonish any one who should figure up the cost of this upheaval as far as it has already gone. The disaster and inconvenience is not a whit diminished by the fact that the strikers are probably losers in larger ratio than anybody else. Armistice and arbitration, as we early suggested, are the true solution of the difficulty, to be followed by the amendment of the interstate commerce law.

It is a somewhat remarkable thing that notwithstanding the strenuous labor agitation which has prevailed in this country since the spring of 1893, congress has paid very little attention to the subject. Of late Senator Peffer and a few other extremists have taken the matter up, but the representatives of neither of the great national parties in neither house have shown any interest in any phase of the serious distress and business disaster which have characterized the United States for a year and more. Certainly the welfare of their constituents ought to interest congressmen of all parties, but till Peffer's excited speech of the other day none of our statesmen who grace congressional marble halls appear to know that any special crisis exists. We shall be greatly mistaken if there shall not prove to be a larger portion of the membership of the next house of representatives who will have been elected with a view to modifying the interstate commerce law and to evolve something like order out of the existing chaos which characterizes everything relating to trades unionism and labor.

All along the line in all the newer States the tendency is to decrease the salaries of public officers. But it is gratifying to note that this is not proposed or carried out by horizontal process. On the contrary, it is an equalization that is going on, having not only economy in view, but the making of the pay accord with the exactions of responsibility and labor, the service in private business of like character to that in public business being taken as the standard. This reform will go far toward relegating mere political seekers to the background.

AN EXCITING EXPERIENCE.

And When It Was All Over the Station Agent Mended Things.

At a way station on the Louisville and Nashville one winter the station keeper had an exciting time. It was midnight, and the station being in a deserted part of the country had been left by the loafers. It began to rain. The station keeper was not sleepy and determined to sit up a greater part of the night, especially as he had an unusual sum of money in his cash drawer, and he felt uneasy about it.

Robberies of stations and farmhouses down the line had been frequent. So he settled himself down to a vigil. As he felt hungry he took a can of cove oysters down from the shelf and set it in the stove. A moment afterward there was a knock at the door, and he admitted a cold, drenched tramp, whom he allowed to lie down by the fire. Just then a train came around the bend, and the station agent stepped outside to display the go ahead signal. He felt distrustful of the tramp and feared that he would fool with the money drawer. As the train passed he hurried into the room and had scarcely opened the door and seen the tramp standing by the stove with something glistening in his hand, when there was a report, and the agent felt a stinging sensation over his eye.

Although blinded with blood from the wound, he drew his pistol and fired five times into the room. He then dashed round to the rear of the station and hid under the platform. After an hour's time he crawled out, resigned to the loss of his money and thankful that he had escaped with his life. The room was dark; the fire was out. The tramp had evidently escaped with his booty. Sorrowfully the agent lit a match, but instantly dropped it when a startling sight met his eyes. He lit another one, found a candle and gazed about at the scene of desolation.

The lamp had been shattered by a bullet. A cheese had been perforated with two bullets. The room was filled with smoke from the stovepipe, which a fourth bullet had perforated. Strangest of all, the room was filled with cinders, and oysters frescoed everything. Oysters, oysters, oysters, cove oysters. The agent gasped and realized it all. The can had remained in the stove too long, and being seized up had exploded from the steam when the tramp poked the fire. Of course the tramp skipped when the shooting commenced. The cash drawer was intact. A piece of tin was found near the door, where it had recoiled off the agent's face. The agent spent the remainder of the night in mending the stove door.—Louisville Commercial.

Better Than Faith Cure.

"Yes," said a tall stranger in a dark suit of clothes as he lighted a fresh cigar in the office of the Pacific hotel. "Yes, it was the most extraordinary case I ever knew. I had rheumatism for 10 years. Both arms and shoulders. Had to be fed like a baby. My arms hung helpless for two years. No use of them whatever."

"And you mean to say that you were cured without a dose of medicine?" asked Landlord King.

"Entirely without medicine. In one moment, as if by miracle."

"I've heard of such things," remarked the man in his shirt sleeves. "It was under circumstances of strong mental excitement, wasn't it?"

"Yes."

"I thought so. You were induced to believe that you could be cured if you only made the effort, weren't you?"

"I suppose so. Something of that kind."

"Then there's nothing strange about it. The history of medical practice is full of such cases. It was only an instance of what they call faith cure."

"No," said the man in the dark clothes reflectively, "you could hardly call it that. The cure was effected by a man who met me on a lonely road with a gun in each hand and said, 'Hold up your hands.' And I held them up."—Pomona Progress.

Indian Names.

Sometimes names have been made to appear unnecessarily grotesque in their writing—in some instances as much so as the rude savage himself appears personally—the fact illustrated in the writing Yonghiogheny for simply Ya-og-hana and in Esquemeaux for Es-ka-mo. Many purely poetic garbs of the old words have become incorporated into our permanent geographical literature. The names Mississippi and Tennessee are examples of the fanciful versions of the old aboriginal titles—the former is supposed to have been in sounds represented by the English writing Mes-sis-sa-pa, while the oldest historic records extant showing the latter give the writing as Ten-as-sa. What is evidently one ancestral word appears in the modern versions of Siewance, Sewance, Suwance, Swanan and Chowan. The French writing Cheyenne is the same word in the remote ancestry, as is now believed.—Popular Science Monthly.

Who He Was.

Dr. Meredith, a popular and well known clergyman of Brooklyn, in a recent address to his Sunday school, urged the children to speak to him whenever they met him.

"I may not always recognize you," he said, "but you all know me, and I want you to speak to me." Not long afterward a small boy accosted him on the street with:

"How do you do, Dr. Meredith?"

The doctor stopped at once and replied cordially and then asked:

"And who are you, sir?"

"Oh, I'm one of your little lambs," was the unexpected and offhand remark as the youngster sauntered on.—Brooklyn Eagle.

F. W. Holbert was in town a couple of days this week.

Mrs. Chas. Meroney, of Keeler, is visiting friends in Independence.

James R. Moffet returned from Los Angeles the early part of the week.

Al. Tate, A. F. Mairs and C. Brown are spending a few days in Onion valley.

Train arrived from the North last night bringing a through mail from San Francisco.

It is reported that Al. Tate will soon open a butcher shop in the old brewery building.

The miners in Mazourka canyon continue to replenish the gold supply in limited quantities.

Mr. James A. McKenzie and wife of Lone Pine were visitors at the county seat on Saturday last.

Mrs. Julia Church, of Hawthorne, arrived at Independence by Thursday's train on a visit to her mother, Mrs. Blair.

Mrs. Eunice Johnson and Miss Alice Stecker, of Los Angeles, arrived at Independence this morning on a visit to relatives and friends.

It is reported that Mr. E. H. Edwards, of Lone Pine, arrived from San Francisco by last evening's train accompanied by his bride and sister-in-law.

P. H. Mack, Esq. and family are camping in Onion valley. As a disciple of Isaac Walton Mr. Mack is a success—fishes all day and don't get a bite.

Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Densmore and Miss Elsie Gill are expected to arrive in Independence this evening. They are returning from the Midwinter Fair by private conveyance.

Rev. S. W. Albone requests us to announce the discontinuance of services at Georges Creek for the present, also that evening services will commence at 7.30 o'clock instead of 7.

Special train will leave Mound House Friday for Candelaria. Leave Belleville Saturday morning for Keeler returning leave Keeler Sunday morning and Candelaria Monday morning for Mound House.

Henry Rhine has gone on a fishing trip to Onion valley. Mr. Rhine is an expert with the rod and line, especially with the line, as he sent one to the store requesting them to forward one dozen cans sardines.

Mr. J. J. Gunn and family arrived from San Francisco by last night's train. Mr. Gunn reports everything quiet along the line of the railroad and the strikers not infering in any manner with the running of the train.

During the past few weeks the water in the creeks has been rising, the warm days and nights melting the snow in the high Sierras. Very little snow is left in the mountains and we fear the water supply will be scarce before the end of the season.

I. H. Mulholland and wife are rusticating in the Sierra Nevadas. As far as heard from Mr. Mulholland has been most fortunate in enticing the finny beauties from their retreat, and as editor and proprietor of a family journal, he can be relied upon to tell the truth in regard to size and number.

Quite a number of our town people have gone to Onion valley on a camping and fishing trip. They must be having unusual good luck in fishing as the last time the pack train came down an order for seventy-five pounds of beef accompanied it. They will use the porter-house steaks and roasts for bait.

TROUBLE OVER WATER.

THOS. J. GOODALE SHOT FROM AMBUSH AND PROBABLY FATALLY WOUNDED.

We take the following from the Index:—For several months past there has been contention and brewing trouble between James Hines and Thomas J. Goodale over the water of Saw-Mill Creek, used on the Ezra Goodale ranch at Black Rock and a portion of which water is claimed by Hines. A suit has long been pending in the Superior Court between those parties, involving their respective rights to the use of the water. Both parties had established camps on the creek at the heads of their ditches and the water was frequently changed from one to the other dams being put in and torn out on several occasions.

Last Monday evening about Sun-down as Mr. Goodale was coming from his home place at Fish Springs, and just before he reached the Ezra Goodale place, he saw that his brush house at his camp on Saw-Mill Creek was burning. About 8:30 that evening Justice Davidson, of Independence, returning from a trip to Big Pine, was hailed by Goodale and asked to issue a warrant for the arrest of Hines on a charge of arson. The Justice invited Mr. Goodale to get in the buggy with him and ride to town where a proper complaint could be made and warrant issued. As Goodale declined to do this at that time, Mr. Davidson suggested that he come to town the following morning and make the necessary complaint, to this Goodale responded that he might be murdered before morning, when Mr. Davidson advised him to take no chances, remarking that his life was more valuable than all the water. About midnight of Monday, Mr. T. J. Goodale was joined by his son, Volney, and H. J. McCarroll and the three went from the Ezra Goodale place to the burned camp on Saw Mill Creek, about a mile distant. There they found that the camp and contents, valued at about $50 had been destroyed by fire and a dam put in the Creek at the head of Hines' ditch, a quilt from Goodale's bed being used to tighten the dam. Mr. Goodale says:

"The two young men laid down their guns and took out part of the dam, letting all the water down. After that they came to where I was lying on the bank. It was cold in the water and their hands were cold. McCarroll lighted his pipe and commenced smoking. I was also smoking with my back to the West, which was the direction the shots came from afterwards. I had just thrown down the match from lighting my pipe, when I heard the report of a Winchester and supposed someone had accidently fired one of the guns the boys had laid down. Right afterwards another shot followed and appeared to strike McCarroll. Almost immediately a third shot followed. I judged the shots were fired about four feet apart, judging by the flashes. They came from west of where we were."

It is otherwise learned that McCarroll was not struck, but that a bullet passed so close to his head that he could feel it whizzing by. Mr. Goodale continues his relation saying, in substance, that nothing further occurred until after daylight Tuesday morning. He then came down to the Ezra Goodale place for some bread leaving Volney and McCarroll at the camp on the creek. Returning with the bread, he laid it down, borrowed McCarroll's pipe and lit it, and then started up the creek to get his own pipe. When about 50 yards from the boys, walking slowly, looking toward the mountains and standing erect, a shot struck him in the left breast near the nipple, knocking him down. The shooting continued, another shot striking the ground and bounding over him. The boys ran toward him and he callee to them to get down and crawl. Two more shots struck near him and the boys, preventing them from giving him any assistance.

The boys then crawled away, as the firing had ceased, and Volney made his way to the house on the Ezra Goodale place and informed Mr. Stebbins of the shooting. Stebbins at once came to town for Dr. I. J. Woodin and also swore out a warrant for the arrest of James Hines, William Hines, L. F. Smith and G. W. Smith, charging them with assault to murder.

On the arrival of the doctor Mr. Goodale was removed to the ranch, where he now lies in a dying condition, with a hole made by a .44 Winchester bullet through his body. The ball entered his left breast about two inches above the nipple and passing almost directly through the body came out at the back below the left shoulder. It passed through his clothing at the front and back. An inspection of the scene of the shooting, made by Under-Sheriff Holland, showed that the shots were fired from behind big rocks which entirely hid and protected the shooters at a distance of about 100 yards from where Goodale was when shot. It is charged that James Hines and his son occupied the improvised fort, and that the elder Hines fired the shot that wounded Tom Goodale.

The men for whom the warrant issued were arrested by Sheriff Gorman and brought to town before noon on Tuesday. On application for bail, the amount for each was fixed at $2,000, and the Smith brothers were released on giving such bail. It is generally admitted that the Smiths were not at the scene of the shooting, but at that moment were at the house of L. F. Smith adjoining the Ezra Goodale place, and that they will easily prove an alibi when the hearing comes on. Dr. Woodin reported that Mr. Goodale was badly wounded and would probably die, and upon this statement Justice Davidson refused to accept bail for Hines and son.

The cases were set for hearing at 10 o'clock Wednesday, but upon the physician's showing that Mr. Goodale was alive, though sinking, and that either his death or a marked improvement in his condition might be looked for in a day or two, the hearing was continued until next Monday morning.

Mr. Goodale died on Thursday afternoon between 4 and 5 o'clock, and was buried at Independence the following day.

Dr. Woodin made a post-mortem examination, and Justice Davidson summoned a Coroner's Jury and held an inquest on deceased early Friday morning.

The following is the verdict of the Coroner's Jury:

"We find the deceased is named Thomas Jefferson Goodale, native of Connecticut, aged 64 years, came to his death in Inyo Co., Cal., July 19, 1894, from the effects of a gunshot wound received at Sawmill or Goodale creek, July 17, 1894, that said wound was inflicted by intentional shooting, done with malice aforethought, by some person or persons to this jury unknown."

J. W. Smith, Mat. McDonald, J. W. Harper, A. L. Coukin, F. R. Smith, C. H. Church, L. A. Anger, M. C. Maldoon and S. Tapman composed the jury.

Thomas J. Goodale was born in Glastonbury, Connecticut, in 1832. At the age of 17 he set out for this coast on the steamer Humboldt in 1849. In 1863 he began pioneer life in Owens valley, braving the vicissitudes of the Indian without a flinch. Under the act of 1864 he was made a member of the Commission which organized Inyo county. In 1872 he married Miss Maggie Payne, who is now widowed by this deplorable affair. Serving the county in various positions, always with a devoted public spirit. He became in 1877 a candidate for the State Senate, and as a Republican was very nearly elected in a district largely Democratic. Among the few old-timers now left sorrow prevails, and among all there is the most profound sympathy for the bereaved wife and family.

A local bulletin this morning announces that a train left Mound House for Keeler Friday morning, June 20th, which will return Sunday morning, June 22d. Commencing next Monday the C. & C. Co. will run their trains regularly as heretofore. Tickets will be sold as usual to all points on the S. P. Co's. lines. Shippers of freight are notified to have all consignments at the Independence depot not later than 8 o'clock a. m. and 4 o'clock p. m. on train days. Mail trains are still running on the Eastern lines, heavily guarded. The strike is not yet over, though indications point to a speedy adjustment of the difficulty.

By reference to our Candidates column it will be seen that Mr. Lowell A. Eagley, of Big Pine, announces himself as a candidate for the nomination of County Clerk, subject to the action of the Republican County Convention. Mr. Eagley is a young man who has been raised in Inyo county and is thoroughly fitted, both by nature and education, to fill the office to which he aspires. His candidacy should receive favorable consideration at the hands of the Republican Convention.

On or about May 20th, 1894, there left the Lacey ranch at Camp Independence one light bay mare, strip in face, branded 7_P on left hip. The finder will please communicate with R. Rossi, Independence, Cal.

Hard Times and Economy.

It is a great mistake for people who can at all afford to spend liberally to practice economy in hard times. On one occasion during the second empire, when there was a great financial depression, Louis Napoleon commanded his ministers to open their houses and entertain profusely, and the court circles, taking the hint, began such a round of gayety that trade revived, while the manufacturers, plucking up courage, opened their mills, and a crisis was averted. Spending is as much a duty with the rich as saving is with the poor, and it takes both attributes to make a prosperous community.—New York Tribune.

Variety Necessary.

The man who thinks a newspaper should be made up exclusively of reading matter suited to his particular whims and predjudices is pretty hard to please. He forgets that there are others interested in subjects which he deems obnoxious. All kinds of people read newspapers, and there must be variety in the kinds of news published.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

"You just leave all that to me, young lady," said the impresario, nodding good naturedly. "I take the risks! You'll not disgrace Dorimar nor nobody else. You're as good as the best of 'em, though it's money out of my pocket to tell you so! You'll need some drilling about the stage business of course; that—But don't you worry, I'll fix it all right! You've got a month or six weeks' rehearsals, and you'll catch on as quick as most gals, I guess."

Thus far the glory and delight of the merely musical aspect of the adventure had so dazzled Beatrix's eyes that she had thought of nothing else, but now a new idea entered her head.

"Am I to be paid for doing this?" she asked, glancing from her father to Jocelyn. "Of course I mean by and by—if I succeed. Is that what you meant when you talked about my winning fortune? But I would rather not make money in that way—I would rather make it in some other way than by singing, because * * * But I couldn't make it in any other way, I suppose," she added, faltering a little. "Singing is all I can do! And, after all, it would be good if my singing would help pay our debts; that would not be unworthy even of music, would it, papa? I wouldn't take money to get rich, but I would to prevent your being troubled any more by * * * Oh, papa, can it be true? I'm sure you are very kind, Gen. Inigo; and thank you for telling him of me, Mr. Jocelyn."

This speech—a broken medley of musical tones, smiles, wet eyelashes, pauses of reflection and eager utterance—completed the general's captivation. He thumped his fat fist down on the tablecloth and exclaimed, "By Jupiter! gentlemen, I move we drink the health of the new prima donna"——

"And christen her at the same time," put in Jocelyn quickly. "You haven't heard your new stage name, Beatrix. Henceforward you are to be known to the world, not as Beatrix Randolph, but as—what is it, general?"

"Mademoiselle Marana," said Inigo. "Here's Mademoiselle Marana's health, boys! May she stand at the top of the profession, and sing pearls and diamonds, like the gal in the fairy tale! Down she goes!"

"Up she goes! you mean," said Jocelyn laughing. "Well, mademoiselle, how do you like your new name?"

"It's very pretty," answered she; "but how did I get it?"

"If you or your father had been in New York lately you wouldn't need to ask. The name of Mademoiselle Marana, the great prima donna from St. Petersburg and Moscow, is placarded all over town. All the world is agog to see and hear her. The new opera house was built expressly for her."

"But how"——

"I'm going to tell you. There's another lady somewhere, who sings under that name, and whom Inigo had invited to sing here. But she refused to keep her word at the last moment, and since the public must have some new divinity to worship, and since I know it would be painful to your father to have you appear under your own name, I advised Inigo to put you in her place. That's the whole story."

Beatrix's clear eyes grew troubled. "It doesn't seem right to pretend to be another person—it would be deceiving people," she said.

"Nobody goes on the stage under his own name," replied Jocelyn. "To go on the stage is to change your identity, and become some one else. Nobody's deceived, because nobody expects anything else."

But Beatrix at once detected the flaw in this argument. "Why should I be called Marana?" she demanded. "Why not give me some other name that nobody has?"

"It seems to me that that might be preferable," observed Mr. Randolph.

"My dear Randolph, it's merely a business question," said Jocelyn, not sorry to make the explanation to him instead of to his daughter. "We call her Marana simply because Marana is the name in people's mouths at this moment. To give her another name would be to create all sorts of doubt and confusion, in the course of which the dear child's identity would be certain to be discovered. Nobody here knows Marana by sight or sound; so, even if Beatrix were inferior as a singer, they would be defrauded of nothing. But the fact is—as Inigo, who has heard the lady, will confirm me in saying—Beatrix can sing every bit as well as Marana, and rather better; so we are giving the public even more than they bargained for. It's a pure formality, but some forms are of the first importance practically. To bring her out under any other name than Marana would be a great injustice to our friend, the general, who has, so to speak, made out all his invoices and labeled all his goods under that title, and it would be quite as great an injustice to Beatrix herself, who, instead of at once receiving the salary that her genius deserves, would have to fight an uphill battle through stupidity and prejudice, and, taking all accidents into consideration, might not win through at all."

"It may be foolish, but I can't help not liking it," said Beatrix, feeling unhappy. "But you know best, papa, and I'll do what you say."

"I believe the amount of the salary has not been mentioned," said Mr. Randolph, turning to the impresario.

The latter was about to reply when Jocelyn swiftly took up the word. "She will be paid $3,000 a night," said he, "and there will be from three to four performances a week."

Mr. Randolph grew very red, and could not suppress a start. His most sanguine expectations had not exceeded a tenth of this sum. From $9,000 to $12,000 a week!—it was scarcely credible; it was magnificent; it was a fortune once a month! Meanwhile Beatrix sat almost indifferent, much to Inigo's admiration; but the truth was the girl knew nothing of the value of money, and was, moreover, personally much less concerned about the rewards of the enterprise than about the enterprise itself. She certainly never imagined that her father's discrimination between right and wrong could be influenced by such considerations.

After a pause to recover his composure Mr. Randolph cleared his throat and said: "I only asked for information; I know little about these matters, but I presume the sum you name would be considered fair remuneration. As to the morality of the matter," he added, breaking into his shrill laugh, "I agree with you, Jocelyn, that the question is more one of form than anything else; and it would be an ungracious return for Gen. Inigo's courtesy to subject him to the embarrassment you indicate. I think you may call yourself Mademoiselle Marana with a clear conscience, my dear."

Beatrix sighed and faintly smiled. The worst that can be said of her at this moment is that she did not know whether she were glad or sorry.

CHAPTER IV.

WHAT WAS GOING ON ELSEWHERE.

"It's all darn nonsense; but I'll do it to oblige you," said Inigo.

Jocelyn and the impresario staid over night at the Randolphs', and completed the details of the agreement for Mademoiselle Marana's appearance. She was to come to the city in a few days, take up her abode at a hotel, and begin rehearsals immediately. Before leaving Inigo handed Mr. Randolph a check for $3,000, as advance salary, to enable him to make the necessary arrangements; and the two gentlemen took their departure with many professions of good will on both sides.

Late in the afternoon a tall, rather stern looking young man, with grave blue eyes under thick, level brows, and a short, dense brown beard covering the lower part of his face, walked into Gen. Inigo's office, and was informed that the general was expected every minute. He seated himself at a table, undid the roll of paper that he carried, and proceeded to busy himself in making calculations and sketches.

This young man, whose name was Geoffrey Bellingham, was a New Englander, whose family had lived for many generations in an ancient town not very far from Boston. From the early part of the present century, however, their prosperity began to recede, along with that of the town with which they were so closely allied. Large families of children divided and dissipated the property; many of them moved to other parts of the country; those who remained, proudly mindful of their past grandeur, and unwilling to descend to a lower level in search of new ways to fortune, gradually faded out of sight or existence, retaining to the end the old traits of character, rendered harsher and gloomier by their more restricted circumstances. At length, about thirty years ago, Geoffrey Bellingham was born. He was a child of unusual intelligence, and with a strong appetite both for reading and adventure. But the monotonous and lifeless existence of the sluggish old town vexed and wearied him; he wished he had come into the world a hundred years earlier, when men went forth to battle, and to sail the seas, and the days were full of novelty, activity and excitement. His heart stirred within him to bear a hand in the work and movement of the world, and such echoes as reached him of what was going on in other places and lands kept alive this longing and developed it. He met with no sympathy, however, from his own family circle, and at length ceased to make them confidants of his desires and projects; yet this discouragement to the utterance of his thoughts led him to cherish them not less but more ardently. Finally, in his twelfth year, he ran away to sea, taking passage on board a Boston vessel bound for the Pacific.

He was absent three years, and he came home first mate on board an English blockade runner from Liverpool. It was in the midst of our civil war; the blockade runner was captured and Bellingham was taken prisoner. On his announcing his readiness to take service under the federal flag, however, he was allowed to join the crew of a government war vessel. He had the good luck to see a great deal of fighting, and was promoted for gallantry and general efficiency. Before the year was out he met a Confederate bullet, which put an end to his participation in the war, and very nearly severed his connection with all human affairs. Nevertheless he recovered and made his way to the north with $1,000 in his pocket. On reaching his native place he found his father and mother both dead, and his sister (the only child besides himself) married.

He was at this time about 17 years old, but as tall and robust (barring the temporary effects of his wound) as a much older man; with a premature gravity and dignity of demeanor, and a strong, penetrating and resolute mind. After remaining quiet for a month or two, to recuperate his physical powers and to think over his position, he determined to be an architect. He set to work at once, with his usual energy and persistence; and after having familiarized himself with the rudiments of the profession at the best scientific school in the country he entered an architect's office in New York, and worked there from twelve to fifteen hours a day for seven years. Unremitting application such as this, rendered physically possible as it was by an invincible constitution, and turned to the best advantage by a powerful and comprehensive intellect, could not fail to have its effect.

When Bellingham, at the end of his apprenticeship period, set up in business on his own account there were few men in the country who possessed a broader and sounder knowledge of architecture than this young man of 23, or who had so much taste and originality in matters of design. The remainder of his professional history, being mainly a record of well deserved and increasing success, has little interest. At the epoch of his entrance into this story he had had a hand in many of the best buildings of our large cities, both private and public, and incidentally he had been brought in contact with a great number of people whom it might be deemed socially expedient to know. But Bellingham scarcely seemed to have the ordinary social instinct. His manners were abrupt and reserved, and he had a very disconcerting glance for those who seemed disposed to attempt to be familiar with him. He seemed to have a temperamental antipathy against aristocratical or exclusive pretensions of any kind, though in a certain sense no one was more exclusive and aristocratic than he.

The type is no uncommon one, as the critics say; and it is perhaps a pity, nowadays, that it is not a great deal commoner. Though repellent in several ways, it has some qualities of almost infinite redemption. It includes everything that we call masculine. Its exemplars are often deficient in humor; but they have a sternness and simplicity that are to the other parts of human nature what sea salt is to water. They are often unjust, but they are never complaisant. They may be bitter, but they are never sweet; or hard, but never soft. And yet there is another side to them—but only very few—perhaps only one—ever comes to know it. Enough of generalizations.

Geoffrey Bellingham had not the air of being susceptible to feminine charms. His manner, when he was brought in contact with the gentler sex, underwent no gentle and illuminating change. The elements of his nature seemed averse from harmonizing with those of women. When he happened to speak with a woman he would express himself in his usual curt, laconic way, keeping his eyes fixed upon her face the while, with a sort of unsympathetic inquisition. The impression conveyed was that he considered women insufficient and untrustworthy. On the other hand he never railed against them, as self conscious misogynists do; his indifference seemed not to be the result of an exhaustive or mortifying experience of them in the past; it was scientific or temperamental rather. He recognized their functional uses to the race and to society, but did not care to be personally concerned with them more than was necessary.

But his professional reputation was so high and so well attested that his social disqualifications did not injure his success; and when Gen. Inigo conceived the idea of a grand new opera house Bellingham was among those to whom he applied for a plan and an estimate, and it was Bellingham who got the contract. The result was a building which many judges considered to be second to none of its kind in the world. It was beautiful, it was luxurious, it was acoustically a marvel, it was fireproof. Incidentally a number of artists achieved renown and made money by the decorations which they executed, under Bellingham's supervision, for its inner and outer walls. New York boasted of it, the papers contained descriptions of it, and the illustrated journals published pictures of it, and endeavored, but unsuccessfully, to obtain a portrait of the architect. But, as a compensation, there was engraved a dignified and imposing representation of Gen. Inigo, and a record of his brilliant and typically American career.

Bellingham had been waiting in the general's office fifteen minutes when the latter appeared, with Jocelyn on his arm, both in the best of spirits. The architect did not rise from his chair or make any other response than a preoccupied nod to the expansive greetings of the gentleman. "If you have your wits about you," he said to Inigo, "look at this plan and tell me your idea about it."

"What's it all about, anyhow?" returned the impresario, removing his cigar from his mouth and pulling himself together. "Stage entrance! What's the use botheria' with that? Just make it so as they can get in and out, and the gals can see their fellows"——

"No, sir," interposed Bellingham quietly. "I want to stop that."

"Stop what, in the name o' gracious?"

"Fellows hanging round the stage door for the girls to come out. I don't like it, and I mean to give the girls a chance to get off free if they choose."

"Your saving clause will cover ninety-nine cases in a hundred, I fancy," remarked Jocelyn with a laugh.

"What has that got to do with it?" demanded Bellingham, looking at him; "and what have you to do with it, either?"

"Oh, I was only startled to see you turning missionary," replied the other, moving away.

Bellingham paid no further notice to him.

"By connecting the window above the lower door, by means of an iron bridge of fifteen feet span, with the corridor in the building on the opposite side of the alley," he said, referring to his drawing, "you give additional means of exit either by the street door of that building or by the upper passage leading to the elevated railway station. Well?"

"What'll it cost?" inquired Inigo.

"Not more than eight hundred, or I'll pay the difference."

"It's all darn nonsense; but I'll do it to oblige you," said Inigo.

"That way, if you like," said Bellingham, folding up his plan. "Good day."

"Odd fish, that fellow," observed Jocelyn when the architect had gone out.

"I just tell you what," said Inigo, "if that odd fish was an impresario the divas wouldn't go back on him—not much!"

"Why wouldn't they?"

"Oh, maybe they wouldn't dare; but they wouldn't, anyhow."

"What do you know about it?"

"I know a man when I see him," returned the other, wagging his head, "and so do they."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Colonel H. and the Roman Beggar.

Colonel H., of Baltimore, settled in Rome some years since, and for a time received his mail at the bank, to which he always walked morning and afternoon, passing en route through the Piazza di Spagna, where a venerable beggar sat and to whom he gave alms each time he passed. But after a few months' knowledge of Roman beggardom he suddenly ceased to drop the accustomed copper into the extended hat, whereupon the beggar brought suit for 600 lire, which he claimed to have lent to Colonel H., producing at the same time two witnesses to the fact. The victim of this trick lost no time in consulting a native lawyer, who remarked that while he had no doubt of the utter fradulency of the claim, still the testimony of the beggar and the two eyewitnesses must stand in the absence of any rebutting evidence, but that if the colonel would spend half the sum involved he would undertake to defeat the stratagem.

Outraged as he was, the colonel concluded to accede to the attorney's terms, and when the case came up, and the beggar's two witnesses had testified to having seen the beggar lend the money to the defendant on a certain day, the latter's lawyer promptly called two witnesses who made oath that they had seen Colonel H. pay the money back to the beggar on a day that proved to be just a week after the date of the alleged negotiation—this to the amazement of the colonel and the consternation and defeat of the beggar.—Harper's.

How Some Towns Give Themselves Away.

It is an old truth, but only old men seem to understand the particular importance of honesty, simplicity and order. Young towns, like young men, are constantly trying experiments, only to discover that the old way is so much better than any other that they are at last compelled to come back to it. Much has been said as to what is the greatest pity. I think it is that young men and young towns do not accept the lessons of their elders without the punishment of experience. Most western country towns are guilty of all sorts of mistakes, because few of them have reached years of discretion.

However wise a man may be in his individual capacity, and however wise he may have been as a resident of an older community, as a citizen of a new town he votes bonds with the recklessness that characterizes young men in giving notes, forgetting that pay day will inevitably roll around and that they will probably not be prepared to pay. Many of the great fortunes in the east were gifts from communities in the west. The people conspire for months to get control of their valuables, in order that they may give them away.

If there is a valuable franchise in a western country town, the people usually manage to give it away, the recipients being men who have probably been victims themselves in some new community.—E. W. Howe in Forum.

Removing the Tassels from Corn.

Some experiments conducted in 1890 at the experiment station of Cornell university on the removal of tassels from a part of the growing corn yielded very beneficial results. A gain of 50 per cent. was estimated. This remarkable showing led to further tests at the Ohio station, at the Ohio State university. Thirty-two rows of corn, running over quite uniform land, were selected upon which to make the trial. On Aug. 1 the tassels were pulled from each alternate row.

It was found that the unmerchantable corn from the four plots from which the tassels had been removed averaged 24 per cent., while the average from the other four rows was 21 per cent. unmerchantable. The calculations also show that the average yield per acre is about one bushel less than where the corn was left undisturbed. It is thought probable that the tassels were not in this experiment removed early enough.

The theory upon which the experiment is based is that the strength that would otherwise go to the maturing of the tassel and production of pollen is diverted to the use of grains, and from their more complete development more corn is produced.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

By local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

...e way or other that ...got tangled. I started ...en. Now, that was in the af... at 4 o'clock—and tell me there ...ghosts?"

"That was a mere hallucination," I ventured.

"Was it? Not much. Such things don't happen twice or three times any more than lightning strikes twice in the same place."

"Then you saw her again?"

"Yes, three times afterward, and I have never failed to see her when I passed here within two hours of the hour of 4 o'clock, morning or evening. Here comes my relief for dinner. Had yours? No. Sit at my table. It's nearly 4, and as we are about to stop to 'wood up' before we round the bend, maybe you will see the ghost of a steamer yourself. Seein's believin."

Just then the speaking tube from the captain's office was sounded, and I heard the hollow, reverberating tone of Bixby's voice through fifty feet of tin pipe saying one of the cylinders needed repacking and we would stay at the woodpile where we were till it was done.

"That means ten hours anyway," said Kinney. "Thank God, we will get by the bend about midnight."

Ten hours did not measure the time of our delay, and I was sleeping oblivious of ghosts and regardless of Kinney's spook steamboat, when a sharp rap at my stateroom door brought me out of dreamless slumber.

"Mr. Kinney says, 'Would you all please, sir, come into the pilot house?'"

It was the voice of the nightwatch speaking to me as an individual and assuring me that none of myself was neglected. Giving a hasty affirmative, I arose and hurried to the hurricane deck. River pilots have no lights in their wheelhouses at night. Where the beacons are not on the shore they find their dark way by means of the profile of the bank cast against the sky or of some tree or strip of land. I could just see Kinney's face as I came into the pilot house and only enough of it to distinguish its profile. He was smoking his pipe nervously.

"I say,' he said, "it's nearly 4 o'clock, and we are going to pass the wreck. You wanted to see the ghost of a steamboat. I don't want to be alone, and I want a skeptic with me. Light your pipe and sit down."

I did so, while Kinney smoked on till the signal came to start, and presently the wheels of the Baton Rouge once more beat the turbid waters. When her head was fairly down stream Kinney began, as if there had been no interruption to our previous talk:

"Yes, I saw her three times; once coming up the river and overtaking us. Then she came upon us from behind, and I saw her collide with us and melt into air. I never could understand it, and I tell you my reason seems to leave me when I think of it. Why does it follow me? Now look out for it."

Kinney hove the wheel over to port, and the jackstaff of the boat could be seen, as the "night hawk" swung for the pilot's eye to sweep the horizon cut away such rays of light as penetrated the cottonwood forests on the Louisiana shore.

"I don't see her," said Kinney, turning his night glass one way and another, "and it's ten minutes to 4."

"Don't see what?" inquired a strange voice at my side, and turning in surprise, for I had not heard any one enter, I could define in the half gray light of the morning the figure of a man with smoothly shaven face—apparently a youth.

"The ghost," said Kinney, still peering into the space beyond.

"Do you expect any?" asked the stranger.

"Why, I was just telling you—great God, there she is!"

I looked in the direction he pointed, and sure enough, about a quarter of a mile away were the red and green lights of an approaching steamer. I knew enough of the laws of the road on water to comprehend that she was coming toward us, and I could also see she was making tremendous headway. Kinney's eyes, as I saw them flash, were fixed upon her. He neither moved the wheel nor stirred a hand to give warning.

"Kinney," I cried, "that is not the ghost; it is a steamer. It is the White, of the Vicksburg line, bound up. She is to pass here about this time. For the love of heaven, give the signal!"

At such a time one scarcely knows what he says or does. The two great vessels, each of them moving at the rate of fourteen or fifteen miles an hour, seemed doomed to crash upon each other. I knew the White was, ordinarily, filled with passengers. On our own boat were nearly 200 souls.

I tried to wrest the wheel from him; but a strong arm swept us both aside, and the stranger seized the spokes. There was a jingling of bells, a screeching of whistles, a mad cry of human voices, a leaping of flames over light woodwork that cracked and seemed to laugh with joy over the destruction that was being wrought.

But over it all I heard one voice in articulate agony, whose wild, agonizing accents I shall never forget. Then, in the flash of flame, I saw the face of the person who had uttered it. It was the stranger at the wheel. On his cap band, spelled out in letters of gold bullion, were the words, "Pilot, Alonzo Childs!" He was illumined by the blaze and his eyes shone brighter than the fire itself.

"I am punished! My God, is it not enough? I was her pilot! It is the Alonzo Childs!" he screamed.

For a second he towered, like a giant high, over the eight foot wheel; then, throwing his arms above his head, he fell prone upon the floor. Already the glass windows of the pilot house were cracking with the heat. I knelt beside the prostrate form. There was no heartbeat.

I looked up at Kinney. He was standing with his arms folded, his face perfectly calm, but pale as death.

At that moment the flames burst into the pilot house, and their hot breath blistered my hands as I held them before my eyes. I had no feeling of fear, beyond apprehension of physical pain. Death had no terror for me. Besides, there was no escape. I remember just then that Kinney shook me by the arm, and I heard his voice:

"Say, you will set yourself afire in a minute."

I opened my eyes. The steamer Baton Rouge, Bixby, master; Elton, clerk, was having quick dispatch, and my after dinner pipe lay smoking on my knee. Some of its live ashes was on the floor, and some had burned my hand just a little, and Kinney said I had been asleep less than two minutes.—R. R. in New York News.

THE SPECTRAL BOAT.

This story is true so far as the narrator's responsibility is concerned. By the narrator I mean the pilot. His name is Kinney, pilot of the Baton Rouge. The Baton Rouge was the "swift, elegant steamer—Bixby, master, Elton, purser"—plying between St. Louis and New Orleans.

I went aboard the Baton Rouge at St. Louis. Bixby introduced me to Kinney. In Kinney I found a short, thick bodied man with half gray and blue eyes, tawny colored mustache, a goatee, full cheeks, ruddy with health, and the natural color of one whose hair was mixed red and brown.

Kinney stood watch six hours off and six hours at the wheel. He knew the historical points of the river, and he pointed them out one after another.

Dancing and flirting in the cabin below, and drinking and cards were going on always, but I spent most of my time with Kinney, who went on too. As we passed Medicine Ax bluff he abruptly:

"Believe in ghosts?"

"No."

"Never see one?"

"Never."

"What? not of a dead man?"

"No, never."

"Wait till I pass this bar. I'll surprise you with a fact about a ghost. Yes, the ghost of a steamboat, too, by the great low water bayou!"

Kinney turned his wheel with a spasmodic violence and rang the engineer's bells to "slow port" to "fast starboard," and reversed his orders with such rapidity that the mechanic below wanted, by the infernal, to know what he meant. Presently we rounded the bend.

"See that corner of the island, there?" asked Kinney.

"Yes."

"There's where the bones of old 'Alonzo Childs' are laid."

"Well?"

"Mark Twain had his license on that boat. She was taken in the days of the war and run by the Confederates, and Clemens was her pilot. After he had left her and joined the Confederate army the machinery, or so much of it as was any good, was taken out, and her hull passed into the possession of an old chap that owned a plantation just 'round Bayou Sara, below here. He had a land boiler and engine, and used it for boiling sugar and pressing cane. Colonel Hubbard burned the sugar house as he passed by with his detachment of soldiers, but the boiler and engine were saved in a somewhat disturbed condition. The old fellow's name was De Soto.

"De Soto put his old engine and boiler on the hull of the Alonzo Childs, and she was made to travel up and down, inside the Confederate lines, of course. She went between Port Hudson and Vicksburg. At that time I was a 'cub' pilot on a big steamer, and I used to see her. One day I heard she exploded or snagged, and everybody on board was lost. The circumstances of the disaster no one ever knew. A few bloated bodies and some charred pieces of the old craft's timbers floating down the river indicated the extent of the horror.

"After the war I went west to San Francisco, but three years ago I came back and took up my old business. I'm going to quit it pretty soon, and I want you to stay up tonight to see the reason."

"Tell me about it now."

"I will indeed. I never pass the place without horror. It's just over that clump of cottonwood trees. That's where they suppose the old 'Alonzo Childs' passed in. Two years ago I was standing watch alone in the pilot house. The river was up, and we were pushing the gray, muddy waters aside under a full head of steam. I had just pulled the wheel over to make the bend, when I saw a steamer heading straight for us. It appeared to me that she came out of the bank rather than up the river, and I noticed at the moment that she was a strange craft to me. Well, I blowed once to pass to port and steered off to the west shore. Giving her the advantage of the backwater I watched her, and presently I saw from her whistle two escapes of steam. By that I saw that she had blown twice, although I had not heard the blasts. So I blew twice and reversed my helm.

"Still she came on. Do you know I thought she was some up river boat or Pittsburger, thinking she owned the earth, and pushin me 'round so her pilots could tell midwinter yarns about how they had made it hot for a big New Orleans and St. Louis packet? I whistled again. No answer, and she came headin right for us, and getting so near that the danger of a smash was imminent. I blew an alarm blast and stopped, and as she came nearer, bidding fair to strike us just forward of the starboard wheel, I rang the bell to back hard. In the second of interval necessary to reverse the engine I looked at the approaching craft and noted that her speed was terrific and that she made no sound. I closed my eyes for a moment, in order that my sight should not interfere with my ears. There was no noise of escaping steam, no beat of paddle wheels. I opened them again. She was upon us, and, with a bare thought of the passengers below—my own family—I closed them again.

"In that second of mental agony I heard the piano down in the main saloon. Somebody was playing 'Natalie, the Maid of the Mill.' I heard the discord which I knew must have been occasioned by the first alarm of danger—the sweep of the hand over the keys as the player turned suddenly from the piano. I seemed to see the piano cover swept from its place, the open doors of the staterooms and some chairs thrown aside. So vivid was the picture to my senses that I saw, for the moment, which of the chairs were broken. In a second I grew old and lived twenty years. I never thought of escape. I could not have escaped had I so chosen. My senses were so alert as to give me a physical pain.

"I opened my eyes a second afterward and there was no boat. Nothing in sight. Only a blank spread of water, a fast flowing current and our own boat backing at full speed, while Captain Bixby was yelling from the hurricane deck:

"'What in blazes is the matter?'

"I don't know how I recovered myself,

LONDON BOBBIES.

They are Physically Inferior to the New York Policemen.

EFFICIENT AND OBLIGING OFFICERS.

How They Came to be Called "Bobbies" and "Peelers"—An Experience With One Who Was a Little Cranky.

One's first impression of the London policeman is that he is an insignificant looking fellow. In fact, one is likely to form this impression before reaching London if he spends a few hours or a day or two in Liverpool. If anything, the policemen of Liverpool are physically less impressive than those of London. One wonders if such men as these are the result of a diet on the famous "roast beef of old England." In comparison the Broadway squad of New York are literally "out of sight." A visit of several weeks in London will fail to reveal one bluecoat to vie in stalwartness with several hundred who can readily be seen on a single day in the metropolis of the New World. What these men would do in an emergency requiring strength, bravery and endurance can only be imagined by the stranger.

The name commonly applied to a policeman in this country is "bobby." A good many Englishmen are doubtless familiar with the origin of this slang term, though it may be taken for granted that the majority of the rising generation do not receive instruction on the point in such schools as they attend. It may be explained in passing that it took its rise in 1829, when Sir Robert Peel, then home secretary, secured the passage of a bill reorganizing the London police force and increasing its efficiency. Presumably he was known among the irreverent as Bob; at all events the members of the new police force soon came to be known by the diminutive of that contraction and the word "bobby" has made a place for itself—a certain sort of place—in the English language.

The word "peeler," as applied to a policeman, is derived from the surname of the same statesman. "Peeler," singularly enough, is sometimes heard in New York, but "bobby" I believe never. It is safe to say that not one in 100,000 of those in New York who have used or heard "peeler" in this sense is aware of the highly interesting origin of the term. "Peeler," by the way, has acquired such a position in the language as to be used by Kingsley in "Alton Locke" without apologetic or deprecatory quotation marks.

The "bobby" is ordinarily well informed and entirely willing to impart information to those in quest of it. He is polite and obliging as a rule and extremely respectful in his tone and bearing. There is nothing of that haughtiness and superciliousness which are pronounced traits of the policemen of New York. In my experience I have met only one specimen who assumed a political air.

One rainy Sunday evening—it had been raining during the greater part of the day—I was taking a quiet stroll along High Holborn, half a mile or so from my lodgings, in a part of London with which I was perfectly familiar, when I chanced to see a bus going north through a street which I had not before noticed to be a part of an omnibus route. There was a "bobby" standing on the corner and to him I applied for information as to where that particular bus ran. To my surprise he was disposed to treat me rather cavalierly. Evidently he took the inquiring pedestrian for a stranger in search of a conveyance to carry him home. This policeman was red mustached, and, as it proved, of a not too amiable disposition.

"Where do you live?" was the rather surly response to the question regarding the destination of the omnibus.

I told him, though I saw no particular reason for doing so under the circumstances, whereupon he instantly began to tell me where the street was and how to get there. I interrupted him with the remark that I knew perfectly well where my lodgings were and where I was and in short intimated that I was about as familiar with that part of the big city as he himself. Then I hinted that I had asked him about the bus which crossed Holborn at that point.

"How do you expect me to know where every bus goes?" was the decidedly uncivil answer to a perfectly civil inquiry.

I was not to be rebuffed and proceeded to explain that I had seen the bus going past and never having seen one there before felt a little curiosity regarding it and thought he would be able to give me information on the subject. Then he told me what he might as well have said at the outset, but by this time he had become mollified and talkative.

"People expect us to know everything," he said. "And they ask us all sorts of foolish questions. Now it ain't reasonable to expect a man to know all about every bus in London. But I'll tell you one thing I do know and that I made up my mind to learn just as soon as I came on the force. That is, I know just when the last bus runs on every line. And I tell you that is very important. Lots of people don't know anything about it, and just as like as not they will wait a long time for a certain bus when there ain't been any o' them busses runnin for an hour or more. So if anybody comes along and asks me 'long this time o' night how soon there'll be a bus for such a place I can tell 'em in a minute whether there's goin to be an other or not.

"Now I learned all that in the first two or three months I was on the police and I think every one of us ought to know all about it. But then there are lots of things about London that no one can know and yet there are unreasonable people who find fault with ye if ye don't know everything."

On the whole the rather surly "bobby" proved to have a heart in him, and the semiconfidential tone which he assumed indicated that when he once understood his questioner he was very eager to help him in any way possible. Thanking him for his kindness I walked on. When I came back fifteen or twenty minutes later he was still standing at the same corner, but he did not recognize me.—London Cor. New York Tribune.

Large Pine Land Sale.

The lumber firm of Wright, Davis & Co., of Duluth, has disposed of one of the largest tracts of pine lands ever closed out in the west. Besides being heavy owners of pine in the Duluth district, the firm owned 4,000,000,000 feet of standing timber on Swan river, a tributary of the Mississippi. This has all been sold to the Pine Tree Lumber company, a Weyerhauser concern, for a sum approximating $1,300,000. The timber will be sawed at towns along the Mississippi river above Minneapolis, and this concentrates all Wright, Davis & Co.'s business at Duluth.

A Social "Climber's" Reception.

The quirks and quilps of the climbers, as the aspirants for social recognition are called, would make an entertaining volume if they could be gathered together. My friend Mrs. S——, who is worth a good half million, but who is one of the most unostentatious of women, was laughing the other day, with amusement and no malice, over an incident in which she was one of the actors, and which illustrates what I mean.

An unmistakable climber asked a large number of people to her final "at home" of the season, Mrs. S—— among the number. The climber boards and has for her own one fair sized room above stairs, but on this occasion she received her guests in the double parlors on the street floor. During the evening the hostess imperiously waved people into the back parlor in order to "give air" to some one about to sing. In the movement to the rear Mrs. S—— jostled against a screen in one corner, which toppled and would have fallen but that Mrs. S—— caught and readjusted it, and as she did so discovering a woman seated behind it busily sewing.

"Never mind," said the jostled one, as Mrs. S—— apologized, "this is my room, but I have loaned it to ——," mentioning the climber, "and as I was not invited to the reception and had nowhere else to go I am sitting here."

The climber knew nothing of this episode, and later was expatiating to my friend upon the distractions she suffered from having a large house to care for, to all of which her accidentally wise confidant said, "Yes, indeed."—Boston Globe.

When Men Propose.

So few men know how to propose well. Almost always directly a man says "I love you" there comes a pause in the conversation and thence on a paucity of ideas on his part. It is a good thing to lift the strain a little for a man by saying something ordinary and commonplace after the proposal is over. Of course, if it is a proposal you are going to accept, he kisses you some and things like that, and that starts the conversation comfortably or else renders it unnecessary.

But it is a difference when you refuse a man. Of course it is not really fair to let a man kiss you under such circumstances, unless you want to see how he does it and this is going to be your last chance. Some men are so queer, you know, after they are refused. If you are not going to let him kiss you, better get in some quaint little remark right off to set things going again. I have a friend who always says that he has been deceived, that her hair does not curl and that she could not think of accepting a man who had asked her while under the impression that she did not use irons.

This sort of thing, however, sometimes only makes a man ask you all over again. It may be better to be wistful and bored and say: "Now you have gone and spoiled everything. What did you do it for?" This gives a man time to think what he did do it for, and just as often as not he does not himself know. One ought always to give a man a chance like that whether one means to accept or not.—San Francisco Examiner.

A Mournful Reminder.

One of the odd and at the same time pathetic sights often to be seen in Fairmount park on pleasant afternoons is a tall and handsome woman dressed in mourning and leading a pretty little pony by a black silk ribbon attached to its bridle. Speaking of her action in so doing, one of the park guards said yesterday: "That lady has had a sad history of late years. She is the widow of a well to do West Philadelphia man, who died about two years ago, leaving her with a handsome income and three little children.

"The pony was the most proudly cherished possession, and they spent much time riding on it in the park. A year ago they were all stricken with a fatal illness, which carried them off in a few weeks, and their mother was utterly overcome with grief. She has kept the pony for the sake of the memory of her dead little ones, and as you have seen yourself often brings it out for exercise in the park."—Philadelphia Record.

The Arrangement of Lace.

Woman is having her day just now with the lace that fashion declares must hang around the face in the name of a veil. It makes the pretty woman a dream of loveliness and the homely woman almost, if not quite, beautiful. But woe be unto either one of you, pretty or homely, if you do not understand the art of graceful folds. You can have one yard or several draped around your hat, but it must be adjusted with an eye to effect—effect of drapery as well as of complexion. The fall must be easy, careless and apparently unconscious of either one, drapery or complexion.

Unless the wearer is an artist, and thoroughly understands the intricacies of adjustment, it is better to go to a milliner and take a lesson or two. It must be the feminine world has been devoting time to effect, however, for it is the exception where the dear creatures are found with this lace addition to the toilet out of angle belonging to the perfection of art.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

What the Choir Said.

Singers in church and elsewhere are not always so careful as they ought to be to articulate their words distinctly. A little girl entered the meeting house not long ago just as the choir was singing the anthem.

"Halleluiah! Halleluiah!" said the singers; but the little girl, whose thoughts were somewhat preoccupied, we may imagine, did not catch the words correctly. After getting home she startled her aunt by saying:

"I never saw such a nice choir. They stopped right in the middle of the anthem and spoke to me."

"Why, my dear," said her auntie, "I didn't notice it."

"But they did. You know I wore my new cloak, and as soon as I came in the choir said, 'Hardly knew you! Hardly knew you!' two or three times."—New York Tribune.

LUMINOUS FISHES

A Sea Animal That Carries a Very Powerful Searchlight.

HOW THEY USE THEIR OCEAN LAMP.

Creatures Which Inhabit the Deep are Endowed by Nature With Means of Finding Their Way in the Dark.

Government biological laboratories at Wood's Holl and elsewhere along the coast have been very busy studying fishes and other creatures that live in the sea. Sculpins engaged much of their attention. One species, known as the "sea robin," has pectoral fins resembling hands. They are discovered to be actually organs of touch, and the fish walks on them over the bottom, feeling for its food as it goes. The slime of these "toad fishes," as fishermen call the family, is secreted by rows of glands. All fishes have slime secreting organs. In those which live in the depths of the ocean, where is inky darkness, the slime glands are so modified as to be transformed into phosphorescent spots, the slime being luminous. Thus the finny dweller in the dark, unfathomed caves of ocean carries a light about with it to see by.

One species recently discovered is called the midshipman. It has luminous disks along its sides and belly, on its head and at the base of its back fin. In fact it is as profusely decorated with lights as a midshipman is with buttons—hence the name. Each of these luminous disks is a complete bullseye lantern on a small scale, having a lens for concentrating the rays and a reflector behind it composed of siliceous spicules. The light comes from a layer of phosphorescent cells between the reflector and the lens.

No other known fish has such an equipment for illuminating purposes. There are a good many species which have reflectors without lenses, while others have lenses without reflectors to brighten the glow of their luminous spots. But the midshipman is the only marine dweller thus far discovered which possesses both reflector and lens. It is a veritable animated assemblage of lanterns. There is a wide variation among deep sea fishes as to their manner of carrying their lights. One kind has a barbel hanging to its chin, on the end of which is suspended what might be likened to an electric bulb, while another sort upholds its light over its head on the highest point of its back fin. In certain species it is believed that the luminous mucus from the modified slime glands keeps running continually down the sides of the fish, rendering the whole animal brilliant.

It is considered likely that these lantern bearing fishes of the depths, which are chiefly head and mouth and highly carnivorous, are able to turn their lights on or off at will. This seems probable on account of the nerves and blood vessels communicating with the slime glands, which have no other apparent purpose. Thus the midshipman may have his power, on approach of an enemy, to suddenly extinguish his torches; whereas, when seeking prey, he can throw out search lights and brilliantly illuminate his neighborhood. This phosphorescent light is similar to that of fireflies, which Professor Langley, of the Smithsonian institution, declares to be the most economical and perfect of all known lights, giving the greatest illumination with the least waste and without perceptible heat. It would be of enormous value to mankind if the secret of this light which the fishes use for their torchlight processions under the ocean could be discovered. Unfortunately the nature of it is wholly a mystery, all efforts to find it out having thus far proved unavailing.

Sharks have lately been affording contributions to science. The biologists have been vivisecting them for the purpose of finding out about the functions of the ear, which in fishes is made to some extent on the same pattern as in man. The fact has been known for some time that the ear is not merely an organ of hearing. It has to do with the sense of equilibrium. Light has been thrown on this matter by removing portions of the auditory apparatus of sharks, which are thus rendered unable to maintain their balance in the water. The part on which this faculty seems to depend is the "labyrinth," and the same effect is produced by cutting the nerves communicating with it.

Science is paying much attention now to the observation of marine forms, because the animals that dwell in the ocean are the oldest in existence. According to the theory of evolution human beings, as well as all other land animals, are descended from them. It is difficult to realize that our ancestors in the distant past lived under water, and that they made their first vertebrate appearance as seaworms, but the scientific men insist that such is the fact. Sharks are selected for certain experiments because they are the most ancient of all surviving types of fishes.—Washington Cor. New York World.

Run by Liquid Fuel.

An engine fitted with liquid fuel has been running on the Great Eastern railway, England—one of a class of ten similar express engines—and, as compared with the other nine engines doing the same round of duty, is reported as doing efficient service—that is, the oil burner has consumed about one third the weight of coal per mile and about as much oil as coal in weight, her total fuel being thus about two-thirds by weight what it would be if all coal, and and practically giving an efficiency of double its weight of coal.—New York Sun.

Dead in the Prompter's Box.

A correspondent relates the following melancholy incident, which occurred the other evening at the Theater des Gobelins, Paris, during the presentation of "L'Oiseau Bleu:"

"The performance was interrupted by a sudden cessation in the dialogue and the leading lady was seen to look intently into the prompter's box before the footlights. It happened that this was in the most interesting point of the third act, and naturally all eyes followed those of the leading lady. The audience of course could not see the cause of the interruption, but the artists on the stage noticed that the prompter had fallen asleep, and by an unfortunate coincidence the actress had forgotten her lines at the same moment.

"After waiting half a minute and the man giving no evidence of returning to consciousness, one of the actors stepped forward and gently shook him. There was no response, and looking closer those upon the stage saw that the prompter was dead. Without dropping the curtain the people on the stage remained in their various positions that the incident found them. The manager stepped to the front and made his explanation, the body was dragged down under the stage and a new prompter climbed into his place, while the play proceeded with only a three minute wait."—Boston Transcript.

Dangerous Pistol Practice.

In the colony Zenon Pereira lived an Italian colonist named Octavia Viale, who had been married but three weeks and was a wealthy man. His brother keeps an almacen quite close to the colony. It appears that he was taking his wife to his house Sunday, the two riding in a cart, and when passing the house of the juez de paz (magistrate), naturally suspecting nothing, this legal officer came out of the doorway with a soldier, to whom he said, "I wonder if I can hit that fellow," whipped out his revolver and fired, shooting the unfortunate man in the chest, killing him instantaneously. The criminal was caught and the colonists were with difficulty persuaded from lynching him. He is now awaiting trial. The body of the dead man was buried next day, all the colonists attending. We hope the law will refuse to allow such a bloodthirsty villain to live to play any more of his murderous jokes.—Argentine News.

Aerial Feats.

W. H. Barber, of Fortuna, Cal., has returned from a visit to the Singley station locality, where with a camera he photographed a man named Jacob Myers as he stood upon one foot on the top of a limbless tree 178 feet high and 14 inches in diameter at the top. Mr. Myers, it is claimed, performed the wonderful feat of dancing a jig on the top of the tree. "Few people," says Mr. Myers, "like to go up so high, but I have never yet seen a place too high for me. It is no trick at all for me in these great redwoods to climb a tree, cut off the top and stand on it. I have stood on the extreme top of an electric tower in Tipton, Ia. The tower was 159 feet high, and I stood on a 1-inch rod with one foot. Of this you can get proof from Tipton. I was a stranger there, but you can find that I did so by asking the people of Tipton."—Cor. Chicago Herald.

Sheep Struck by Lightning.

During the storm of Thursday lightning struck a large tree in a field on the farm of Edward Martin, Pocopson. Underneath the tree was a cow and she was killed instantly by the bolt. Scattered around the field near the tree were twenty-seven lambs and ewes, and after the storm had passed every one of the flock was found lying dead, all their heads being in the same direction, just as the flock had been grazing along in the field. The sheep were of a valuable breed and the loss is a heavy one. A singular feature of the occurrence is that not a mark was to be found on any of the animals.—West Chester (Pa.) News.

It Was an Accident.

The piece of gingerbread that was thrown at Mr. Gladstone recently, damaging his eye and causing a vast amount of indignation, has been bought for a considerable sum by an enthusiastic admirer of the Grand Old Man. The gingerbread is what is known as a "nut"—a rounded cracker the size of a quarter. The proud possessor will have it mounted in gold and gems. It has been discovered, by the way, that the woman who threw it is a very warm admirer of Mr. Gladstone. She simply threw it in a frenzy of enthusiasm, and was very much terrified by the result.—London Letter.

How to Treat Summer Boarders.

Summer boarders, rightly handled, are about the most profitable thing the York county farmer can cultivate. Don't feed them on beefsteak, for they don't want it. Give them plenty of bannock, berries, baked potatoes, boiled eggs and mush and milk and they will be much better suited. Keep them away from the house by getting them to go fishing or hill climbing, and then they can't say it was your mosquitoes that bit them. What they wish is something new to eat and something new to see. Give them these and they pay well for the trouble.—Biddeford (Me.) Journal.

His Condition.

Backby—Why don't you quit work these hot days and spend a few weeks at the seashore? It would do you good.

West End—Well, I'll just tell you. I'd be perfectly willing to spend the time, but it don't pass current for board bills at seaside hotels, and that is all I have to spend. The saying that "time is money" is only a theory after all, you see.—Boston Post.

Needed Rest.

"Ah, Duebill, old boy, where are you going to spend the summer?"

"I can make no definite arrangements until I know where my tailor and other creditors are going to spend theirs. One goes to the seaside for rest, you know."—Exchange.

ARMS OF VINUS.

An English Sculptor's Solution of This Remarkable Mystery.

WHAT JOHN BELL'S IDEAS ARE.

He Thinks That She Stood in the Vast Amphitheater at Melos Typifying a Goddess Conferring Honors.

Any number of attempts have been made to restore to her original perfection the Venus of Melos, who has stood in armless beauty for the admiration of the thousands of art lovers who visit the Louvre, but the original design is as problematical still as the meaning of the monster that guards the pyramids, and so accustomed have people become to the Venus as it emerged from the ruins of the Melos amphitheater that no sculptor has yet been able to effect a restoration which satisfies the sense thus cultivated. John Bell, an English sculptor, has made the latest restoration.

As no mention appears in ancient records of art, there is no knowing what personage or deity the so called Venus may have been intended to represent. She has been entitled a Venus Victrix, and one of her lost hands is supposed to have held the apple, the award of Paris, while another speculation has been that she formed part of a group with Mars. According to another idea, she represented a sea nymph, the special protecting Nereid of the isle. By some she has been said to be a Nemesis, in connection possibly with the Athenian massacre of the islanders, about the time of the Peloponnesian war. By others she has been adopted as a Nike or Victory. Others have assigned to her the names of Sappho, Phryne or a mourning Electra, while yet another version has been that she was a lyre playing muse. The most general idea, however, has been that she was an Aphrodite or Venus, which is highly probable from the almost universal worship of that goddess throughout the coasts and islands of the Ægean archipelago, and it has been suggested that she had a harp in her left hand while she played on it with her right, which the position of the torso and the remains of the arms admit of. But the most favored and at the same time the least dignified of the floating speculations is that she is coquettishly holding and looking in a mirror. The argument in favor of this is that a bronze statuette has been discovered in Pompeii which much resembles it, and it is holding and gazing in a mirror.

To very many archæologists this last seems the most probable solution of its mystery. Certainly the pose is appropriate; certainly the denitoileted condition is in accordance with the theory too. But Mr. Bell is incapable of entertaining this notion of its "motivo," and having addressed his thoughts to some mission that seemed to him more worthy he has decided that a great goddess conferring honors is more in keeping with the dignity of the sculpture.

Though small, the island of Melos must at one time have been very populous. It was famous for its catacombs, famous for its cyclopean ramparts and for its huge amphitheater. It was in the ruins of this last, in a cave grotto, that the figure which from the Paris Louvre charms the world was found. Mr. Bell thinks its original situation was in the amphitheater; that it posed as the genius loci of the structure, and that at some time of commotion it was removed to the grotto for protection and concealment.

"Methinks I see her there," he says, "in the vast amphitheater thronged with adorers of the great goddess, the central object at some high festival.

"Under this aspect what species of motivo is open to us for the restoration of this noble work consonant with its grand form and majestic presence? She stands with the utmost firmness and dignity, and a benign smile is on her face as she slightly bends forward. The principal fractures indicate that her left arm and hand was raised and her right advanced before her. The amphitheater in which I assume her to have stood was no doubt the accepted site for the holding of high public festivals and for the bestowal of the insular honors for public services and for literature, philosophy, poetry, music and the drama, and for victories in athletic games, which formed so integral a part in the culture of the Greek race. From the above considerations has sprung my conception of what it is possible she may have represented and the mode in which the lost arms and hands may have been held and employed."

In pursuance of this conception Mr. Bell has invested his attempt at restoration with "the character of a great goddess conferring honors." One hand bestows a wreath of glory; the other holds one in reserve and there you have a Venus Denatrix.—Magazine of Art.

John Bright's Bust.

In the president's mansion is a marble bust of John Bright, and very likely there is no one connected with the White House who knows its singular history and how it came there. An English gentleman, who was an admirer of the United States and of Abraham Lincoln, commissioned a sculptor to execute that bust to be presented to the president. When finished he forwarded it to Mr. Ludley, the United States consul at Liverpool, that he might make the presentation.

On the very day that the bust was received at Liverpool the consul received also the news of Lincoln's assassination. He wrote asking what now should be done with the bust to the donor, who replied, "Give it to the nation."

A Bad Color for One Family.

Edmund Russell, of Delsartean tendencies, loves red, but warns people against too free use of it. "I know a house," he says, "with a red room that gives the whole family the color of raw beef. They are rather highly complexioned people—high livers probably—and the strong red of the walls brings out the strong reds of their cheeks so that they look like butchers."—New York Times.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

Irv. H. Mulholland,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.
PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, JULY 27..... 1894

The Los Angeles Herald says editorially: "We were greatly shocked last night to be told that Mr. C. Mulholland was dead. The information came to us through the agent here of the California Irrigation Company, Limited, who said he received a dispatch last evening from Independence, Inyo county, giving the bare announcement of his death. The cause or the exact time is not mentioned. We tried to get into telegraphic communication with Independence so as to learn the particulars of this important event, but were unable to do so. Mr. Mulholland was no ordinary man. He was possessed of great force of character, indomitable persistence and an earnestness of purpose controlled by a clear, well-balanced and cultured mind. He was well and favorably known to our people and with his pen and from the rostrum has disseminated more valuable and exact information about the natural resources and dormant wealth of that vast interior country that lies back of us clear to Utah than any other of the many men who have explored that interesting region. It seems strange to us that so conspicuous a personage could have passed away without the fact having been sent broadcast over the wires at once. In this remarkable failure of publicity we apply to ourselves the hope—faint though it may be—that there is some mistake as to the main fact. Mr. Mulholland for years ably edited the Inyo Independent, a paper of exceptional power and influence outside of the place of its publication."

Senator Allen's additional report to the Senate Sugar investigating Committee is somewhat sugary in tone, but a little peppery in suggestions. Everybody has done what everybody else has done with the best of motives, but everybody is advised not to do so again. The Senators who have speculated in sugar stock did not mean to do wrong, but in view of the confusion of certain Senators as to what is wrong, Mr Allen thinks a law should be enacted to restrain them and others of like obtuse moral perceptions. The names of several Senators are mentioned as having taken part in the forming of the sugar schedule, but there is no evidence implicating any body as doing anything dishonorable. While law is a good thing to fall back upon in the regulation of men's morals a surer agency is a correct public opinion. It ought not to be a question if a Senator may speculate in stocks that may be affected by his vote. A Senator who is caught in so doing should have the grace to hide himself in the securest spot he can find. The brazen manner in which speculating Senators still appear in the Senate after the public has arrived at a knowledge of their operations is one of the mortifying features of the exposure.

Dan Burn's State Central Committee has, it is said, revised the platform adopted by Dan's State Convention at Sacramento and left out important parts of it that were displeasing to certain people notably the part that was displeasing to the Prohibition element of the party. Dan expects to corral the liquor vote with the platform that was published while the convention was in session, and to gather in the votes of the religious people with the "revised" platform.

The want of competing lines of railway into this state was never so badly felt as during the recent strike. It is not likely that, had there been several roads all of them would have refused to go without Pullman cars. The one that refused to haul them would have soon enjoyed a monopoly of the traffic, and the ogre's stuffy bunks and their bread-and-butter would soon have been sidetracked on all the lines.

It would be a good idea for the heirs of Thomas H. Blythe to allow the lawyers to divide the estate and then get a settlement from them. The attorneys are dividing without the heirs permission, and all are afraid they will get mad about something and give the litigants nothing.

THERE WAS GOOD FISHING.

Likewise Good Luck on a Phenomenally Good Imagination.

The scene of the following incident was about 40 miles from Gloversville, N. Y., on a beautiful little lake just across the tableland at Piseco lake, in Hamilton county. The day was all that a fisherman could desire, and every condition was right for good fishing. A party of three were in the boat—namely, L. E. Everest, his friend, Professor Spencer from Brooklyn, and the writer.

They had taken nearly 50 pickerel in less than half a day, and the size was good, weighing from 2½ to 6 pounds. The last turn around the "lucky point" was being made before we started for home. Everest, who was trolling one of the lines, said: "I've got another. He's a big one from the way he pulls." Everest let him play at one time nearly 200 feet of line before the fish could be turned. When he had been brought into sight, he was not so large as some we had already in the boat, but there was an unusual motion all about him. Soon the line was drawn so tightly it was necessary to let him play again. When brought back, it was discovered that a large pickerel had attempted to swallow the one on the hook, which was now quite exhausted.

The big fellow still followed, sharklike, for the dead body of his victim, which, however, we were not disposed to give up. Just as Everest was about to swing the fish on his hook into the boat the professor took up his oar, hoping to strike and thus capture the large one. The movement of the oar attracted the attention of the fish, and in a twinkle he made a pass at it. The blade was about 7 inches wide, but his jaws grated across the upper and lower edges, sawing a groove on either side with his sharp teeth. The professor, by carrying his oar forward with the movement of the fish, at the same time raising it from the water, landed the huge fellow into the boat.

He weighed 13½ pounds. The fish on the hook only weighed three pounds, but showed signs of battle, being bitten in several places. Upon opening him we found, as is often the case, a fish of smaller size in his stomach. This one showed signs of life and was opened. We then discovered a pretty little gold chatelaine watch and were surprised that the time agreed with our watches and that it was running.

More than pleased with our fishing expedition, we returned to the Adirondack hotel and informed Landlord George A. McCoy of our good luck, at the same time showing the watch. In less than two minutes all the guests about the house were in the office, and among the number was a pretty young lady from Albany, who said that the watch was a token of friendship which she had prized very highly. When on the lake in the early part of the day, it had fallen into the water, and, she supposed, was lost. It is needless to say she was overjoyed at its recovery.—Albany Journal.

Do Swans Sing Before They Die?

The story that tells of swans singing before death is very old, and of course is founded upon fancy. The idea has been brought down from ancient myths. The voice of the swan is extremely harsh and disagreeable, without a single musical note in it, and no good reason can be found for likening some of the world's sweetest poets to this unmelodious voiced fowl.

The only approach to a verification we have ever seen is the following, clipped some years ago from a Virginia newspaper:

"A sporting friend, recently returned from a foray upon the Potomac river, below Mount Vernon, was the guest of a venerable and highly intelligent lady, who has always lived on the Potomac. Speaking of the swan, she gave it as her decided opinion that this bird was in the habit of singing or making a plaintive noise when dying. The reason she gave for entertaining this belief was that on very many occasions in the last 50 years she had been awakened at night by a sweet and exceedingly sad noise, something like the tones of a flageolet coming over the water, and that on every subsequent morning a dead swan was found to be floating on the water or to have been washed ashore."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

The Bang Called In.

One of the most noticeable changes in fashion this season is that which affects the dressing of the hair. The "fringe" has been gradually giving place to softly waved bandeaux, and the bandeaux are creeping gradually lower down until the return seems imminent to the puffed and waved bandeaux to be seen in the portraits of Jennie Lind taken along in the fifties. To young and delicate faces the style has an agreeable piquancy and quaintness, but to women past their first youth or with strong, coarse features the bang has a softening effect much to be desired.

Another style now gaining favor and one becoming to round faces with low foreheads is that of turning the hair back from the forehead loosely in a twist that is lost in the light coils and puffs arranged in the middle of the forehead. In this style of coiffure the front hair is parted off on either side and twisted in the old fashioned way into two rolls.—New York Sun.

The Deluge.

In answer to a correspondent a newspaper says: "The deluge mentioned in the Bible was threatened in the year 1756 B. C., and began on Dec. 7, 1356 B. C., and continued 377 days. The ark rested on Mount Ararat on May 6, 1655, but Noah did not leave it until Dec. 18 following." Any reader who imagines that it would be an easy task to figure these details from a Biblical account can find a basis for his calculations in the seventh and eighth chapters of Genesis.

...dry for fact and go by ... travelers and hunters, ...ful whether the lion de... ...nificent reputation. It is ...nce, no doubt, which has ...him the appellation of "king ..." with all the regal honor per... ...it. Certainly he looks "every ...ing." Nothing can be finer. The ... itself could conceive nothing more ...gly representative of majesty than ... full grown male lion, gazing with ...t yellow eyes, which seem to know no fear, and the ample honors of his shaggy mane wrapped round his massive front and forearms. He looks like the embodiment by nature of lordliness and magnanimity, and he has been adopted as such in all literature and poetry from Homer and Æschylus down to the "lion comique" of our music halls. Yet he is only a cat—a great cat—after all, and those who know him in his native wilds give a very different character of "felis leo" from popular conceptions.

We do not wish to calumniate a creature so intimately connected with British story and so dignified in bearing and behavior, for nobody can deny that the lion is a great gentleman in his manners. Nevertheless, African sportsmen relate that he can show himself as cowardly as he is cruel; that he will abandon his consort and cubs in a moment of extreme danger, and that he scarcely ever charges straight home upon anybody who, armed or unarmed, has the presence of mind to await his onset. He is described as very nervous and very cunning, and dreading beyond everything the superior prowess of the white man.

The early Dutch settlers at the cape speak of lions prowling round the fort at night "in such numbers as though they would take it by storm." Now one must go very far into the African "veldt" to see a lion, and a strange fact is that he has learned the craft of silence and is seldom or never heard to lift up his mighty voice except in the far wilderness, where the hunters have not come except singly. Thus it is written in an African guidebook: "Though his footprints may frequently be seen near the mountains of Lokaron and Boatlanama, and he will sometimes venture to carry away an ox from a wagon span thereabouts, he rarely or never makes his presence known by his roar, having learned apparently that it will only have the effect of frightening off the few timid antelopes upon which all hopes of replenishing his larder depend, or, worse still, of betraying his position to his inveterate enemy and persecutor, man."—London Telegraph.

It Was All Love.

A writer for the Boston Transcript was the witness the other day of a very pretty scene on a street car. There was an old negro woman—a very black old woman—whose face, besides being black, was pockmarked. No doubt a superficial observer would have called her repulsive, but there was a sweet and kindly look in her eyes and a benevolent expression about her black features which, as you looked at her, gave you a glimpse of something beautiful.

At her side, with his sweet child face toward the window, knelt a little white boy—a handsomely dressed little chap with blond curls and blue eyes. He asked the old black woman questions now and then, which she answered with a deep, grave, kind voice, and she called the little fellow "honey."

Presently this little Caucasian leaned over tenderly toward the old woman, put his arm lovingly around her neck and laid his pink and white cheek against her black face. That obliterated every bit of repulsiveness the woman might have had with every person of sentiment in that car. To this little boy the old black face was entirely beautiful, because it was all love. The beauty that he saw was a good deal more than skin deep.

The Ring Pheasant.

This bird was imported from China by O. N. Denny some eight years ago. Six pair were let loose on Petterson butte, about four miles from Sodaville, Or., and the climatical conditions and country being favorable and being protected by a strict law for six years they have multiplied rapidly and now are one of our most common game birds. In fact, they multiplied so rapidly that long before the six years' protection had ceased the farmers complained bitterly that the birds were a serious damage to their grain and gardens, and many birds were killed, but in this I think they were mistaken, for in my examination of many stomachs at all seasons of the year I found but very little grain as their food, but many wild seeds, bugs, grasshoppers, etc.

I think that the farmers have realized this also to some extent, as nearly all have now posted trespass notices for their protection.—Science.

It Went Unpunished.

This story is told of the late Dr. Holland, better known as "Timothy Titcomb." During the service of one of the large churches in Springfield, Mass., a heavy electric storm came up, and one of the gentlemen of the choir set out to secure an omnibus to take the ladies home. Among the fair singers was a certain Miss Etta S——, and as Dr. Holland was gallantly helping her into the vehicle a terrific clap of thunder startled them, upon which he remarked, "'Ett' in terror packs home in a bus" (Et in terra pax hominibus). To close this strange tale, it may be well to add that the doctor was not immediately struck by lightning, but died years afterward peacefully in his bed.—San Francisco ...

Her Paradise.

There is a Washington young woman who, in addition to having sensitive nerves, is intensely devoted to Browning. Much of her time she applies to the discovery of new mysticisms and much more to worrying over them. Not long ago she was quite ill. A friend called on her and said consolingly:

"Never mind, dear. This idleness will make you enjoy life all the more when you are about again."

"I don't know," sighed the patient. "Perhaps I will not get well."

"Oh, you don't think of such things as that, do you?"

"Yes."

"You take it rather cheerfully?"

"Oh, I don't mind it at all. Perhaps I shall meet Mr. Browning in the next world, and we shall have such a good time explaining his works to each other!"—Kate Field's Washington.

At Mazourka.

The miners of Mazourka canyon continue to bring in gold. Last week over $600 worth of gold dust was brought to Independence from the lately discovered placers. We predict that as soon as cold weather shall have set in the output of gold from this section will be something startling. At present there are but few men working, owing to the intense heat and scarcity of water. On Friday of last week the Vaughn Brothers brought to town twelve ounces of gold which they took out in ten days, hauling water to their claim and washing the dirt in a pan. Louis Tournie has been making about twenty dollars per day with a drywasher. He is expecting a new machine in a few days by the means of which he will increase the yield of his claim. The Mexican gulch still continues to yield good returns. As all the work yet done has been superficial; when mining is begun on an extensive and solid basis a very prosperous camp will undoubtedly be the result.

Through the Mountains.

Mr. Kimball and party of Visalia are camping in Onion Valley, about twelve miles west of town. They expect to go into the Mt. Whitney country about the 1st of August and will return home by way of Mineral King. On their way over Earl Kimball was accidentally shot in the right leg, the ballet entering just above the knee and coming out on the other side, making a flesh wound but doing no serious injury. The party is well prepared for a long camping trip and are enjoying themselves hugely.

Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz of Independence received the second prize at the Midwinter fair for display of Indian work, the first prize going to Mendocino county, which had a very extensive exhibit costing several thousand dollars. The lady worked indefatigably to secure her collection and went to great expense to obtain it. She is to be congratulated on receiving the meritorious reward, and Inyo county owes her a vote of thanks for receiving recognition.

Preliminary examination in the Goodale murder case closed on Wednesday. L. F. and G. W. Smith were discharged as there was no evidence adduced connecting them in any manner with the killing. Hines and son were remanded without bail.

A meeting of the Republican County Central Committee will be held Independence on Monday evening next to appoint delegates to the District Senatorial Convention and arrange for holding the County Convention.

C. B. Rawson came down from Bishop to day on business connected with the old Blackrock sawmill, which has been dismantled since 1890. The machinery has been removed to the new sawmill near Big Pine.

A curious anomaly is to be found in Pleasant Valley. CHAPTER V.

HOW EVERYTHING WAS MADE PLEASANT AND EASY FOR HER.

"What are the services for which this is the payment?" Mrs. Bemax inquired.

Two or three days afterward Jocelyn betook himself to a small and rather shabby looking house in East Eighteenth street, and asked if Mrs. Bemax were at home. The woman who opened the door said, in a weary and discontented voice, that Mrs. Bemax was in, and Jocelyn went upstairs. He entered the front room on the first floor. This room had a dingy and brownish aspect. The furniture was meagerand rickety. Upon the wall between the windows hung askew a print of the Prince of Wales and his family, taken from some illustrated paper and framed in a wooden frame stained black and varnished. The only pretty thing in the room was a photograph of a chubby little child about 4 years of age. It was mounted in a tasteful standard frame of stamped leather, and a small vase containing two or three flowers stood in front of it. The photograph itself was much faded and was in the style of ten years ago.

In a few minutes a tall, middle aged woman, with a square shaped face and rather strongly marked features, came into the room. Her eyes and brows were dark; her hair was slightly touched with gray. The corners of her large mouth had acquired an indrawn look, apparently from a habit of pressing her lips together; her general expression was studiously impassive. She looked like one accustomed to meet with rebuffs and disappointments, and to put up with them when necessary, though never with meekness and resignation. There was an air about her that showed she had once been familiar with the handsome side of the world, but, from whatever cause, had discontinued to enjoy or practice its refinements. There were more hard and unpleasant things in her memory than the contrary, and these memories and experiences had worn away her former comeliness and made her skeptical and somewhat malicious, instead of gentle and engaging.

"Well, Hamilton," she said, as she came in, "I hope you've brought me some money."

"Money, my dear Meg! Didn't I send you some last week?"

"Yes, enough to pay up my arrears of board. I've had none to spend on myself for a month, and I have only one other dress to my back, and that is not fit to be seen."

"Things are more expensive here than in England. I told you that when you insisted on coming here. You would have been more comfortable at home."

"Home is where the heart is," she replied, with an intonation of somber sarcasm. "My heart is not in England, wherever else it may be."

"Well, I've been very busy," said Jocelyn.

"So you always tell me; but I presume, as usual, it is no business of mine."

"Well, my dear, it's only the money aspect of my business that you feel any interest in."

"If you mean there is no longer any sentiment between us I cordially admit it," was the answer. "I don't care the snap of my finger for you or for any one else now alive. But I have some claims upon you, and I've come here to enforce them."

"You have the photograph there still, I see," remarked Jocelyn, turning to the table. "Poor little fellow! If he'd lived I'd have made a man of him."

"Yes! You'd have made the same sort of man of him as you've made woman of his mother. I'm glad he's dead, if it's only to save him from knowing what sort of a father he's got! However, you said that to put me in a good humor, I suppose. What do you want?"

"I vow, Meg, you're too confoundedly sour for anything," exclaimed Jocelyn, twisting his wiskers. "I've come to tell you of an arrangement that will enable you to live at your ease the rest of your days, and this is the way I am received. Come, now!"

"It is impossible you should intend any benefit to me that would not benefit you ten times more," said Mrs. Bemax impassively.

"You do me gross injustice; you are like all women with a grievance!" returned Jocelyn, whose temper was certainly very easy. "My scheme is to put you in receipt of an income of $1,200 a year. Have you any fault to find with that?"

"What are the services for which this is the payment?" Mrs. Bemax inquired.

"To chaperon a lady—nothing more."

"A lady!" repeated the other, a peculiar smile drawing down the corners of her mouth; "I begin to understand! Who is she?"

"The prima donna at the new opera house."

"Yes; in whom you are tenderly interested. Taking everything into consideration, Hamilton, that is very characteristic of you; a very delicate piece of kindness!"

"Bah! Meg, your cynicism is overdone; you are on a wrong scent entirely. In the first place, the lady is not the person she's supposed to be. She's the daughter of an old friend of mine; I once intended to marry her, but—I thought better of it. Circumstances which you will be fully informed of have led to her personating the Marana—name and all—the coming season. It's a grand secret, of course, and I selected you as the only woman who could be trusted to keep it. You are to confirm in every way that suggests itself the idea that she is the bona fide Marana; say you've lived with her for years in Europe, and so on. But she is wholly ignorant of the world, and you are to see to it that none of the young fellows gets ahead of her. You may invent all the adventures you like for her—in the past, but on no account let her get into any scrapes in the present. Do you see what I mean?"

"I think so. The young fellows you speak of are to be kept out of the way for your sake rather than for hers; and she is to be instructed that any scrape she gets into with you is no scrape at all, but a distinction and a blessing."

"Upon my soul I should flatter myself you were jealous if I didn't know you so well," said Jocelyn with a laugh; "I only wish to protect the girl from annoyance and to insure the success of the whole scheme. If you could make me believe in your disinterestedness and virtue the only result would be that I should serve you less efficiently than otherwise. But you always liked deception for its own sake, and you are the same Hamilton Jocelyn that I knew in Richmond twelve years ago. Well, I shall know what tone to take with her."

"Take any tone you like, in the devil's name, so long as you take the position and observe the conditions!" exclaimed Jocelyn, getting up, with some signs of impatience.

"I will take the position on condition of being guaranteed my outfit and twelve hundred dollars," said Mrs. Bemax. "It is not high wages for the devil to pay, but it's better than nothing, and to live as comfortably as I can, so long as I do live, is the best I have to look forward to now. I'm not so fastidious in other respects as you do me the honor to imagine."

"Well, Meg, when you've enjoyed a few months' luxury you'll take a more genial view of things, I hope. Above all things make as good an impression on the lady as possible. She must learn to confide in you, and to take your advice in all social matters from the outset. You can do anything with her if she likes you and trusts you, and nothing if she doesn't."

"I understand; I am to be another mother to her!" said Margaret Bemax, in a tone and with a look in her eyes so quiet and yet so repellent that Jocelyn made no attempt to reply, but took his leave without further ceremony.

Certainly Beatrix needed a mother at this epoch of her career. The peculiar conditions under which she was making her entrance into the world rendered her especially defenseless. She was not only ignorant (as any girl brought up in the seclusion of home is likely to be) of the ways and wickedness of mankind, but the strict necessity of her incognito cut her off from the support and society of both her father and of all the other relatives and friends who should naturally be around her. She was not herself, and she was somebody wholly different from herself as well. Furthermore she was a singer, with all the sensitiveness and the liability to emotional impressions that the musical temperament implies. Upon the whole a young woman can select no career more dangerous than that upon which Beatrix had just entered, and the external circumstances which attended her entrance could scarcely have been more untoward.

Meantime the subject most constantly present to her thoughts, since it gave color to everything else, was her assumed character of the Marana. To be herself began to appear in the light of something criminal. Everything depended upon maintaining the deception. Nor could she disguise from herself that the men she met treated her with a sort of freedom to which she was quite unaccustomed. This perplexed and annoyed her, and Mrs. Bemax, when she appealed to her, only smiled and said she mustn't mind them. Finally she thought it would be a good idea to ask information of Mr. Jocelyn.

"Fellows bother you, do they?" said that gentleman in answer to her complaint, with a reassuring smile. "Well, ma'mselle, you know we mustn't be too particular about that. When we have been on the stage a little longer we shall learn to look upon all men as our brothers, and not mind a little fun. Besides, you know, you are the famous and invincible Marana, and are supposed to be able to settle all such Jack-a-dandies with one hand, so to speak!"

"I don't understand you," said Beatrix, with a slight flush.

"Well, my dear, the amount of it all is they mean no harm, and they've heard so many stories about the Marana's adventures that they feel justified in trying to find out what she's made of. The fact is, you know, she's said to be a little hazarde—dangerous—as soon ruin a man as look at him, and you must act out the character."

"Do you mean that I should pretend to be anything that is not—good?"

"Oh! no, no—not that, of course! Only a sort of give-and-take, live-and-let-live style—that's what you want."

"If they think I am different from what I am, in any bad way," continued Beatrix, "I will either tell them who I am or give up the whole thing." Her voice trembled.

"Now my good little prima donna, don't you say anything so foolish!" said Jocelyn, taking her hand in his and patting it. "Come, you know me, don't you? and you know whether or not Hamilton Jocelyn would permit any one to insult you? Very well, then; you're as safe, if the worst comes to the worst, as if you were sealed up in the center of the pyramid of Cheops! But what I want you to learn is to have courage—to hold your own bravely, and not to be too squeamish about what the people you meet with say and do. The world always seems queer and a little disagreeable when one is first brought in contact with it—full of people not a bit like our quiet folks out in the country. But we can't change the world, can we? All we can do is to take things as they are, and make the best of it. If we are all right nothing can really hurt us. But we must have courage, we mustn't be afraid, we mustn't talk of giving up! We must be a little woman of the world. Every woman must be who intends to accomplish anything, let alone to make such a reputation as lies before you. It's a little freemasonry we all have to learn, nothing more; and, as I said, though you won't love me—naughty child!—yet you can't help trusting your father's old friend; and as a matter of course you will come to me if you get into any real scrape. I shall be only too ready to assist you; but I don't want to seem officious either to you or to others, and I want you to fight your own way as much as possible at first. It will make it all the easier for you hereafter. Don't let yourself be put upon, of course, but don't altogether forget that you're the Marana either. If you manage it cleverly her name ought to be a help to you rather than the contrary."

"In what way?"

"Oh, the sharper the fight the sooner over, you know, and the more decisive," said Jocelyn, laughing. "Yes, it is an advantage in every way. If you were entered in the lists in your own name, with your father and all your friends to fall back on, you would be falling back all the time. You would be trusting to their strength instead of to your own. But since you're alone you'll discover your own force, and make it evident to the others into the bargain."

"But will not papa live in the hotel with me?"

"My gracious, no!" exclaimed Jocelyn, lifting his hands in half playful consternation. "In the eyes of the world remember he's nothing but a respectable old gentleman, in no sort of way related to you. To have him in attendance on you would be most—what shall I say?—inexpedient; and if it led to nothing else, it might lead to his true relationship being found out. No, you may see him occasionally, of course, but on the same footing as any other chance acquaintance. Ha, ha! You wouldn't want to compromise your own father, would you? not to speak of being compromised by him!"

"Well, I certainly am alone!" said Beatrix gravely.

"In appearance, yes; but so long as Hamilton Jocelyn is alive you'll have an unfailing resource."

"I should compromise you as well," said she, looking at him fixedly. He made a laughing gesture of depreciation.

"Oh, don't be afraid of that! I'm known; everybody understands me! We can do no possible harm to each other. It's an understood thing that I stand godfather to all prime donne on their entry into New York society. You may safely refer to me as an old friend on all occasions. And, by the by, I've taken the liberty to do you a bit of service already. You need a companion, and I've been so lucky as to secure just the person. She's an English lady, daughter of a clergyman; I've known her for years; an excellent creature; really a lady of great refinement and experience, and precisely suited to your needs. She will take perfect care of you, and keep you posted about everything you ought to do and all that sort of thing. I have let her into the secret, the only other persons who know it being your father, Inigo, and myself. The idea is, of course, that she's been living with you on the continent, and all that sort of thing. Mme. Bemax, she'll be here tomorrow morning. You'll be certain to like her immensely."

"Well, what must be, must, I suppose," said Beatrix, folding her hands in her lap and looking down. "It does seem hopeless to think of going back now I have come so far. But if I had understood beforehand." * * * She paused, but went on after a moment. "I seem to be living in the midst of falsehoods, and it seems to me that that is more likely to take away courage than to give it."

"Pooh, pooh! things will very soon shake down, and then in everything but name you can be more yourself than you ever were before!" returned her father's old friend encouragingly.

The next day Mme. Bemax was introduced, and was very genial, helpful and agreeable.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

A Crop Which Needs Harvesting but Once Every Four Years.

In a beautiful sweep of lowland north of Melvale station on the Northern Central railroad and about nine miles from Baltimore there is a peculiar farm. It is peculiar in that it renders to its owner and tiller but one crop in four years, and that a crop of willow shoots. The farmer, Antone Spath, came from Frankfort, Germany, many years ago, and after erecting himself a comfortable stone house, which still stands in the midst of a picturesque clump of willows, at the end of the little valley, set about planting his first crop of willow shoots. Every year since he has gone on planting row after row until the valley has become covered with them. Spath had learned the art of weaving willow ware in his boyhood days by the shores of the Main river, and as fast as his little plantation grew he gathered the shoots, stripped them of their green covering, and after drying them wove baskets of every conceivable form and size.

"It seems rather peculiar work in this country," said the willow farmer, speaking of his business, "but in all parts of Europe, especially in the German provinces, it is a very common thing to find willow plantations and willow weavers, for there willow is used in many forms and for a greater number of purposes than I find it used in this country. In Germany and France willow is employed in making at least 20 different kinds of bird cages, while in America metal is used—brass or iron wire—and different woods. Among the best families in European countries cradles, woven by German workers, may be found constructed entirely of willow. Then there are a hundred and one shapes of marketing baskets, baskets used by milliners and laundresses, baskets and panniers to be carried upon the backs of man and beasts for holding fish and fowl. In preparing the willow for the weaver we plant the slips in long rows parallel with a running stream of water and cut them when they have attained four years of growth. The cutting time is early in the spring before the sap is done running, and after tying them in bundles they are placed in ponds of water to keep them in a green state until ready for stripping. Stripping the willow is accomplished by drawing the switches through and between two heavy iron stanchions, whose edges peel the light green bark from the white heart, and then, after drying or curing them upon long racks, we have got the willow in a form for the weaver. It was many years after I planted this farm with willows before any one thought of imitating my example, but now there are several other plantations located upon the Washington and Annapolis roads, and though you may find quite as busy scenes there you will scarcely find a more picturesque place than this anywhere, and that was one of the reasons that led me to settle here."—Baltimore American.

Waves on the Great Salt Lake.

A strong gale of wind was blowing over the lake and driving its surface into low, white capped ridges, while along the shore the foam lay like flat banks of new fallen snow. If it had passed across a lake of fresh water of equal extent, that wind would unquestionably have produced such an agitation of its surface that navigation in small boats would have been difficult if not highly perilous.

But the waters of the Great Salt lake, although driven into ridges as just remarked, showed a curious resistance to the wind and the waves, rising to only a slight elevation, moved along with an appearance of lethargy that the eye could not but notice.

Yet there was an immense momentum stored up in those low, heavy, slow moving waves. Venturing into the water at a point where the depth did not exceed four feet, the observer found that it was impossible to stand against them. Their sheer weight swept him resistlessly along.

The curious buoyancy of the water, containing 22 per cent of salt in solution, increased the helplessness of the bather. He was not submerged, as sometimes occurs in the Atlantic breakers, but was lifted and carried like a cork.

It would probably have been impossible to dive through an oncoming wave after the manner practiced by bathers along the Atlantic coast. In the Great Salt lake people are not drowned through sinking, but strangled while still afloat. The bitter water may enter the air passages with fatal effect, but the body continues to float until it reaches the shore or is picked up.—Youth's Companion.

Possessed of Excellent Habits.

A fond parent residing in a small New York state village wrote recently to an old friend of his, a Worth street merchant of this city, making inquiries regarding the habits of his son, who was in the old merchant's employ.

"I trust he keeps good company," the letter said, "and is cultivating no bad habits. Do you know where he sleeps at night?"

To this the merchant replied: "I do not know where he sleeps at night. But don't worry yourself on that score. From the amount of sleeping he does in the store in the daytime I'll warrant he gets sufficient rest."—New York

A Terrible Accident.

A terribly fatal accident destroyed a whole family at Cotbus, Germany. Father, mother and two sons were occupied in cleaning out a cesspool, so deep that they could not get in without a ladder. Suddenly the father, standing on the ladder, became unconscious and fell. His son hastened down to rescue him and fell also. The same happened to the second son, and the mother, seeing her whole family in the pool, also went to try and fetch them out. She had hardly stepped upon the ladder when the poisonous gas rendered her also unconscious and she fell down. When it was possible to take them out all four were dead.—Chicago Herald.

Pussy Did It with a Little Hatchet.

A peculiar accident befell the two-year-old daughter of George Colvin, at Hope, Wednesday afternoon. The child was playing about the room in which the cat lay fast asleep on a shelf. Near where the cat lay was a hatchet, and a movement by the cat knocked the hatchet off the shelf, striking the child on the face and cutting a gash nearly four inches long. The child is in a somewhat precarious condition from the loss of blood.—Providence Journal.

CROSSING THE ATLANTIC

Usually involves sea sickness. When the waves play pitch and toss with you, strong indeed must be the stomach that can stand it without revolting. Tourists, commercial travelers, yachtsmen, mariners, all testify that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is the best remedy for the nausea experienced in rough weather on the water. Nervous and weakly travelers by land often suffer from something akin to this, and find in the bitters its surest remedy. No disorder of the stomach, liver or bowels is so obstinate that it may not be overcome by the prompt and thorough remedy. Equally efficacious is it for chills and fever, kidney and rheumatic trouble and nervousness. Emigrants to the frontier should provide themselves with this fine medicinal safeguard against the effects of vicissitudes of climate, hardship, exposure and fatigue.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

By local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

THE UNSEEN HAND.

I plant my land and build my beautiful home;
I gather riches, power; men bow low
To me, an emperor in my little Rome;
In pride imperious; in spirit grow;
But pausing, lifting heavenward my eyes,
See wider visions than my little world.
I see amid the stars in limitless skies
The all of me and mine are noiseless whirled,
That I and mine by the stronger will and hand
Are ruled, and in creation's boundless sphere,
Unfelt by me, are moved at his command
To ends I can't control, so need no fear;
Thus humbled in my pride I can but find
True peace in sincere work and modest mind.

A BACHELOR'S PERIL.

If ever there was a foreordained bachelor, that man was Major Teller. Some men are born to old bachelorhood—others have old bachelorhood thrust on them—and the former class belonged to our major. You could have picked him out in a multitude; if he had been labeled, like an antediluvian fossil or a dried specimen of entomology, there couldn't have been more certainty in the matter.

He was a dapper, thin little man, something under five feet in height, with a glossy black wig, closely trimmed side whiskers and costume so daintily neat that he reminded you of a shining black cat! He took a Turkish bath in the morning and a Russian bath in the evening; he came home to dinner at 12 precisely, and went to bed at 11 at night, with his boots standing at the foot of his bed and his stockings at the head, and his wig elevated on his gas fixture, and every chair in the room standing at right angles with the wall.

It was high noon on a sparkling, windy March day when Major Teller came home to the antique down town boarding house where he had vegetated for the last twenty years and went to his own room to brush his wig for the midday meal. Opening the door he stumbled over an obstacle in the way.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, I'm sure," said the major, turning very red and recovering his footing with difficulty.

It was Miss Patience Pettigrew on her hands and knees cleaning off the oilcloth at the door.

Now the major was afraid of Patience—afraid of her as the plump lamb fears the gaunt wolf, or the unoffending robin the dire serpent. Miss Patience was tall and lean and sallow, but she curled her hair and wore an artificial rose over her left ear, and sang little whistling tunes to a little spindle legged piano, and firmly believed that if she only waited a little longer she would get married to somebody! And because the major sat opposite her at the table—Miss Patience helped her married sister "keep house" and served out the gravy and sauces—and regarded her artificial rose and bear's grease curl with a sort of fearful fascination, Miss Patience somehow opined that she should one day, Cupid willing, become Mrs. Major Teller!

"It's of no consequence, major," said Miss Patience, recovering her piece of soap, which had skirmished out to the middle of the carpet. "I hope your fire isn't out!"

"Thank you, ma'am; it is very good."

"I do wonder, major," said Miss Patience, with a premonitory giggle, "why you never got married."

The major retired precipitately behind the coal scuttle and made no reply.

"You'd be so much more comfortable, you know," added Miss Patience, wringing out her woolen cloth and looking so lovingly on the major that he retreated still farther into his wardrobe, where, among the swinging effigies of coats and trousers, he felt comparatively safe.

Miss Patience hesitated a moment, and in that moment the major felt all the antici[illegible]atory agonies of being pursued, captured, brought forth and possibly married before he could get breath to remonstrate! But she finally took up her pail and vanished.

"Dear me, that was a very narrow escape," thought our hero, emerging from his sanctuary. "Some day she will be too much for me. Perhaps I'd better change my boarding place. Yes—that will be the only safety. I suppose I couldn't very well have her sworn over to keep the peace, and really there's no saying what a determined woman of fifty might not do I'll look out for a new place tomorrow."

"Dear me, major, you have no appetite," said Miss Patience sweetly at the dinner table.

"No, ma'am," said the major.

"Try to eat a little—just to please me, major."

"No, I thank you, ma'am!"

"Don't you know, major, people will say you are in love if you don't eat more?" smiled the antiquated spinster.

This was more than our hero could endure; he rose up and left Miss Pettigrew triumphant victor of the wordy field.

"I won't go back to that house if I can help it," thought Major Teller, brushing the cold dew away from his forehead with a crimson silk pocket handkerchief. "Her intentions are serious; I know they are."

And the major in his innermost mind reviewed the catechism and hymns he had learned as a child, trying to think if there was not some invocation particularly suited to an elderly gentleman in great peril and perplexity. But he could not remember anything appropriate to his particular case.

"It's twenty years since I've been in the inside of a church," thought the penitent old offender. "I wish I had gone a little more regularly. I wonder if it's too late in life to reform!"

For the major, poor old gentleman, had a vague idea that "religion" would be a sort of safeguard against the wiles of his fair enemy. Deliverance from Miss Patience Pettigrew must be obtained on some terms or other.

As Major Teller was frantically revolving these things in his mind he came to a sudden and involuntary standstill. There was a crowd gathered in the street—a stalled electric, or an arrested pickpocket, or some other nucleus around which gathers the rapidly increasing swarm of metropolitan loafers. Now of all things, Major Teller most dreaded a crowd, and he looked around nervously for some means of escape.

An old fashioned church, with open doors and some sort of service going on inside, caught the major's eye. He made an instantaneous dart for its huge gothic portals, shielded by inner doors of green baize.

"It's a good chance to think up something solemn and appropriate, and that sort of thing, until the crowd gets by," he thought, settling himself in the corner of one of the softly cushioned pews to listen to the mild, droning voice of the old clergyman.

The church was very warm, and the light, softened by purple and golden and crimson glass, was dim and the clergyman's voice rather monotonous, and Major Teller was unconsciously becoming rather drowsy when a plump old lady came in and the sexton beckoned him from his seat.

But the sermon was over, and people were streaming down the aisle, and the major felt that he didn't care to prolong the thing, and that he had done a very laudable act in coming to church, and——

Even while these ideas were passing indistinctly through his brain he was borne toward the altar in an upward eddy of the crowd and felt a gaunt arm thrust through his.

"Protect me, major! Oh, save me!" whispered Miss Patience Pettigrew. "I'm so 'feared in a crowd always!"

The major strove to withdraw his arm, but Miss Pettigrew would not let him. They were standing directly in front of the altar, arm in arm. The minister, old and nearsighted and a little deaf, advanced, probably concluding that his services were required.

Major Teller's blood ran cold. He tried to protest, but his tongue seemed paralyzed. Miss Pettigrew had captured him as a lamb for the slaughter, and where was the use of further struggle? A few words—an appallingly brief ceremony—and Major Teller was married to Miss Patience!

"Take the market basket, my dear," said the gaunt bride, "and stay—you'd better carry the umbrella too! We'll go right home. Old folks like you and me don't care for wedding tours, do we?"

The major looked piteously at his better half and made no answer. She, however, waited for none, but drew him along with a quiet determination that augured ill for the future.

"Give me the key to the room, my dear," said Mrs. Pettigrew Teller. "I'd better keep it in future."

The major handed over the key without a word of remonstrance, and his elderly wife opened the door.

"We'll slick up things a little," said Mrs. Teller, bundling the major's beloved papers together and pitching his box of cigars out of the window.

"But, Miss Patience"——

"What?"

"My dear wife, I mean!"

"Ah, yes. What were you about to remark?"

"My cigars—I"——

"Oh, well, I don't like smoke—never did."

"But what are you doing with my slippers?"

"Trying 'em on—they fit me so nicely. Guess I'll keep 'em, Sempronius. I wish you'd take all these coats and things out of the wardrobe—I want it for my dresses."

"But where shall I keep them, Miss Pa"——

"What did you say?"

"Mrs. Teller, I would remark."

"Oh, under the bed or somewhere! Pink soap, eh?—I prefer castile—cologne—German—cold cream! Who'd 'a' supposed you were such a dandy, Sempronius? You must have plenty of money. By the way, suppose you give me the money to keep now, my dear! I'll manage it a great deal more economically than you'll be likely to."

"But"——

"Give me the money, I say!"

Major Teller meekly put his hand into his pocket and submissively handed over the purse.

"Well, now, you'd better go about your business," said the gentle bride, "and not come home till teatime—I do abominate men lounging around in the way forever, and don't come back smelling of tobacco, if you know what is good for yourself, Sempronius Teller."

The major crept silently away, thinking how, the last time he crossed that threshold, he was a free man, and now——

"I'm married!" mused Major Teller. "I couldn't help it. It wasn't my fault, but here I am, no money, no cigars, no freedom—worse than any galley slave. Sixty years old next month, and—married to Patience Pettigrew!"

He walked disconsolately down the street, both hands in his empty pockets and his hat tipped recklessly down over his eyes. A greater contrast could hardly have been imagined than existed between this slovenly, seedy, wretched looking man and the trim, cheerful little Major Teller of six hours ago! He caught a fleeting glimpse of himself in a mirror belonging to some picture frame store as he sauntered by—it startled even himself.

"I wouldn't have known myself," he muttered gloomily. "Well—I'm married now—married to Patience Pettigrew!"

He stopped at the street corner, uncertain which way to go. But as he gazed the bright, steely glimpse of the river caught his eye.

"All right," muttered Sempronius moodily. "I'll go and drown myself; it's a short way out of a long lane of difficulty. Anything but going back to—Patience Pettigrew!"

He went down with long, determined strides toward the shining, broad stream, where the ships lay peacefully at anchor, and the little boats shot hither and thither, and the waves sparkled up like sheets of diamonds. All these things Major Teller saw without marking them, as he made resolutely for the pier.

"Want a boat, sir?" demanded a sturdy man.

"Yes," said the major; "I want Charon's boat, to row me over Styx!"

"Don't know him, sir," said the puzzled boatman, "but mine's sound and light, and"——

The major waited to hear no more, but gave a blind, downward jump!

Down, down with that peculiar sensation of falling so familiar to us all—down—down—until——

"Beg pardon, sir, but the church is going to be shut up, and everybody's gone. Hope you have had a good nap, sir!"

The sexton spoke satirically, but in his tones Major Teller recognized hope and freedom. He started wildly to his feet.

"Then I am not married, after all, sexton?"

"Married, sir! Not unless you have been married in your dreams!"

"That's it, exactly!" ejaculated the major, jumping up; "I've been asleep and dreaming!"

Major Teller satisfied the sexton with a donation whose liberality astonished even that personage, and went at once to the —— hotel to engage rooms.

"I'll send for my things," he thought. "I won't go back to that house, lest Miss Patience Pettigrew should do something desperate. I'm not married, and I don't mean to be married!"

The major was right. Discretion is the better part of valor—and Miss Patience Pettigrew remains Miss Patience Pettigrew still! But Major Teller goes to church very regularly now!—True Flag.

Locking the Door by Electricity.

An ingenious lock has been invented by which doors, etc., may be locked and unlocked from a distance electrically. It is specially applicable for doors in private and business houses and offices where absolute privacy is needed or desired. The door is operated by simply turning a switch. Thus the occupant of a room may instantaneously admit a person and as instaneously lock the door on his egress without leaving his chair, as the switch can be placed close to his hand.—Practical Electricity.

ELECTRIC CHIMES.

Grace Church's Innovation May Make Some Great Changes.

THE PAST AND PRESENT METHODS.

Chimers Do Not Favor the Electric Keyboard, Which Makes the Work so Easy That Women May do it.

The electric attachment by which the Grace church chime is rung is the latest development in chime ringing—the most scientific and yet the simplest way of producing music from church bells now known to the world. Musical work that once required the arms of a number of strong men is now done with the touch of a finger, and instead of ten men collected in the belfry pulling at ropes one young woman sits before a keyboard and plays upon the 10,300 pounds of metal cast into ten bells as she would play upon a piano.

When the chime of the original Trinity church first made itself heard in New York there were five bells in the chime, and from each bell a rope ran down to a platform in the lower part of the tower. When the chime was to be rung each rope was in the hands of a man. In front of the men stood the director, or principal chimer, each man pulled his rope when the signal was given him, and the proper sound was produced. The director alone knew anything about the music, and even he was usually not an accomplished musician, but he came in time to be so familiar with the tones of his bells that he could play them better than any other person.

The first great improvement in the mode of ringing made it possible for the chimer to do his own work, and the services of the five or more ringers were dispensed with. Instead of a rope coming down through the ceiling from each bell, the ends twisting themselves upon the floor like so many snakes, the ropes descended through neat openings made for the purpose and the ends were attached to the rear ends of handles fitted into a rough framework in such a way that when the handles were depressed the bells were struck. Sometimes there were also pedals for the feet, and with these the heavier bells were rung. At a later period, by a complicated arrangement of cords and springs, a small bell was made to ring in the chime loft, and with this bell a church officer down in the auditorium gave the chimer his signals, telling him when to begin and when to stop.

Eventually the ropes themselves were discarded and galvanized telegraph wires were used in their stead. The surroundings still were and are to this day extremely rough, for bare stone walls and rough and generally dirty floors and a plain wooden bench are not thought to interfere with the chimer's work. The duties of the chimer become harder, for he must do them all himself; but he now began to take great interest in his work and came to be a great man in the church, inferior in usefulness only to the clergyman and organist. Mr. James Ayliffe, the great Trinity chimer, who died in 1878, held the place for twenty years. John N. Senia, who was retired from his place in Grace church when steps were first taken for the introduction of an electrical keyboard, had been the chimer of that church for nineteen years.

The principle of chime ringing is the same as it was ten centuries ago, and probably must ever remain unchanged—the striking of a hammer against a bell to produce the sound. But with the electrical keyboard the mechanical part of this is made work for a child. No more force is required than in pressing the key of an organ, and in fast tunes the notes may be struck much more rapidly than they could possibly be produced by hand. The principle is much the same as in playing the organ by electricity; pressing a key completes or sometimes opens an electric circuit, weights and springs are set in motion, the hammer strikes the bell and instantly flies back to its place, and in a second everything is replaced and the apparatus is ready for another stroke.

The old chimers of the city naturally do not favor the introduction of electric keyboards. They have for years had the work very much in their own hands, and have commanded good salaries. But with the electric keyboard chiming is so much simplified that any person of average ability and experience can do it, and no unusual strength is required.

The use of electricity in ringing Grace church chimes opens a new field for women, although not a large one, as there are only five real chimes in this city. There are monastery bells, peals and half chimes, but only five real sets of chimes. To learn the business will be a much easier matter than it ever was before. The beginner may practice noiselessly upon a "dummy" built in his own house if he choose, or he may go to the church, if the chimer will let him, have the wires disconnected, and practice indefinitely without making any disturbance. For this work the learner must of course first become so familiar with the tone of each bell that his imagination will tell him the sound to be expected, though the bells are silent.

In another way the electric keyboard will make a change in the profession of chiming. Rough stone walls and rough boards have always been thought good enough for the chimer, while the organist sat upon a cushioned seat in a comfortable place, with handsome surroundings; but with women in the chime lofts there is little doubt that within a short time the chimer will sit in a handsome, well furnished room. This room, indeed, may be back of the pulpit, or in the basement, or in the next block—for location is of little account to the electric chimer. For the Grace church chimer to sit in the Windsor hotel or in his or her own house in Chicago and ring the Sunday morning peals not only would not be impossible, but would not be at all difficult.

"Why not put in a chime attachment to the organ," one of the New York chimers asks, disdainfully, "and let the organist play it?"

This question is intended to be a reflection on the new method of chiming, but it could so easily be done, and would be such a natural consequence of the electric keyboard that the less the chimers press the subject the better.—New York Sun.

Indefinite Sentences For Criminals.

"The transformation of the criminal into a serviceable member of society," says Professor Charles A. Collin, "is the only effective protection of society against him. The mere temporary caging of the criminal as a wild beast is a protection to society for the time being, it is true. But if, when he is let out of his cage, he is worse than when he went in he may be more wary and cunning thereafter, but he will be more dangerous to society than before he was caged."

Under the present system the convict is discharged at the end of a fixed term, with a new suit of clothes and a few dollars in his pocket.

"How many graduates of Harvard university," Professor Collin asks, "dropped upon the world in such a fashion, with all the benefits in character, ability and reputation which Harvard can give them, with no friends except such as beckon them to haunts of vice and criminal ways of earning a living—how many Harvard graduates under such circumstances would get through the next two years without being compelled to beg, borrow or steal?

"How then can you expect the discharged prison convict, with the firmest of good resolutions (as many at that moment have), but with no satisfactory references to previous employment, with no friends of whom he can borrow, intoxicated with the sudden sense of freedom, to avoid the commission of new crimes before he can earn an honest living?"—Boston Commonwealth.

Hetty Green's Closeness.

Old Wall street men tell innumerable stories about Hetty Green's closeness and about her wonderful success on the street. She was in Philadelphia one day when the market suddenly changed, and she found that unless she reached New York before the close of the Stock Exchange she would miss a chance to make several thousand dollars. No train would bring her here in time, and she opened negotiations for a special engine. A price was named for an engine and one car, and after haggling some few minutes Mrs. Green made this final proposition:

"Take off the car and make it $5 less. I'll ride in the locomotive cab." She had a dusty but a speedy ride to this city, and she reached Wall street in time to make a successful turn. At another time she had a large amount of Reading securities which she had ordered her brokers to transfer to Philadelphia for her. When she learned that they would have to pay the express company a rate in proportion to the value of the securities, she was horrified.

"What, pay $100 for taking that bundle to Philadelphia! I can go there myself and back for $4 and save $96." She gathered up the securities in her black bag and carried them over to Philadelphia herself.—New York World.

Fond of Ghostly Company.

It is strange in what a matter of fact way persons who have investigated spirit forces consider the originators of them. I know a lady who has been a widow for 15 years who thinks no more of conversing with the spirit form of her dead husband than she does of sitting down at the table to eat. She tells me that almost nightly, while alone in a room of her home, she looks up and sees the form of her husband quite at ease. He never begins the conversation, but waits until his wife speaks.

She told me that she did not doubt that he frequently sat there a long time before she noticed him, as she often became so interested in books or sewing that she never thought of her surroundings. When one once becomes interested in spiritualism, the dread of ghostlike forms becomes unknown. I do not know a spiritualist who would not rather meet his best dead friend than his best living one? Spiritualists believe that persons retain the same characteristics in spirit life that they had in earth life, so they think of them merely as they were when alive.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

The Houri's Wooden Leg.

When released from its position each night, this jeweled limb is guarded with great care and restored to its fair owner when she rises in the morning.—Jewelers' Circular.

Lofty Climbing.

The loftiest point so far as yet known to have been attained by a mountain climber is 23,700 feet, which was accomplished a few years ago by a Mr. Graham in the Himalayas. He states that in spite of the great altitude he did not find any difficulty in breathing, nor did he experience nausea, bleeding at the nose or temporary loss of sight or hearing. The motion of the heart was, however, perceptibly affected, as its beating became audible and its rate was decidedly increased.—Exchange.

A RACE DYING OUT

It is Slowly Perishing of Melancholy and Heartbreak.

THERE IS ONLY A FEW OF THEM LEFT

The Story of His People as Told by a New Zealand Chieftain.—Polished and Draped in English Finery.

A strange, pathetic swan song of a dying people, sung by its chief, is the plaint made to the civilized world by Apirana Turupu Ngata, head of the Maori nation, in a series of essays lately printed in a New Zealand paper. The chief is a well educated man, a graduate of a colonial university, the equal in culture of the best class of white people who occupy his native land. But he is a native at heart, a Maori in feeling, sympathies and aspirations, and all his thoughts are those of his people.

At the advent of the white man in New Zealand the Maoris, a heroic race, then sole owners of the country, were a numerous people. Twenty years ago, although even then much diminished by diseases brought by their conquerors, they numbered 100,000. Today but few more than 40,000 of the race remain. Outwardly it is a much changed people, too, for it has adopted the white man's clothes, his customs, most of his vices and ostensibly his religion. But at heart the Maori is a savage yet.

In his series of essays on his people the chief tells much that is interesting of their history, their ideas, their habits and their feelings, but ever and anon he comes back and dwells on the one theme that is filling his mind and searing his heart—the decaying and approaching extinction of his race. His language is remarkably eloquent and full of lofty metaphor and symbolism, and a somberness overspreads all his thoughts, and sorrow echoes in all he says. He writes bitterly, yet not vengefully, of the woes the white man has brought to his people, not alone of wrongs inflicted, but of the sufferings and defeats that inevitably must come of the contact of a weaker and a stronger race. The Maoris, he says, are dying of contact with the white man, and nothing but a miracle can save them, and a miracle there will not be.

He gives an interesting account of the impression made by Christianity on the Maoris. His countrymen, the chief says, were attracted to the white man's creed almost wholly because of the miraculous career ascribed to Christ. They have a great craving for the supernatural, and the doings of Christ took great hold on their imaginations. But the native priests, taking advantage of the lesson, have largely turned their people from even a semblance of adhesion to Christianity by feeding their craving for the miraculous, and in the lines of the old beliefs, or rather by formulating a new creed called Hauhauism, which has spread greatly.

"The feelings and motives that influence the Maori's inner and more private life today," says Chief Apirana, "are the same that influenced him ages ago, though tamed and refined by conformity to European customs, by contact with European civilization and by the farreaching influence of Christianity. Your Maori of today is but the savage of yesterday, polished and draped in English finery. Within him there are raging the fierce passions that but awhile ago made him revel in slaughter and cannibalism. His hands are bound with the manacles of civilization and humanity, but they are restless to grasp once more the spear, the taiaha and mere. Outwardly he accepts the truth of Christian teaching and worships the Pakeha's god most reverently, but his mind is governed by superstition, and his secret longings and natural tendencies are toward the tohungas, the only visible monuments of his old priestly regime."

The Maori, says the chief, hates the Pakeha, the white man, and yet is irresistibly drawn to his settlements and compelled to a degrading imitation of the worst of his ways of life, which eventually kill off the pure race and leave only the degenerate, half caste people, against whom Chief Apirana is specially bitter. "Illicit intercourse, vice and immorality have already destroyed the purity of the race," he says, "have stunted a race once famous for its physique, have rooted out whatever industrial tendencies survived other pernicious influences and degraded the characteristics it once possessed of hospitality, liberality, bravery and manliness." The only hope of improvement he sees is in the deportation of all the lower whites, and this he himself declares to be impossible. Education only renders the Maori unfit to take part in the struggle for life in which his race is engaged. Taking away the outer show of their savagery, it takes away at the same time their stamina. Notable Maori men and women there have been, educated and enlightened to a high degree, but in the majority of cases there has eventually been a total relapse of the ostensibly educated Maoris into the ways of their forefathers. And now this once powerful people is on the verge of extinction.

Explanations to account for the fading out of existence of the Maoris are not hard to find, and one seems to be near the truth—that is, that the race is perishing of melancholy and heartbreak. There is in all the Polynesian and Melanesian races a strange and strong liability to despair. Entire independence and unhampered imagination seem essential to their vitality, and when these attributes are subdued and cowed by the obvious superiority of an intruding race, as by the white man, they seem to give up the wish to live, to lose even the capacity for living. This hopelessness has been clearly traced in all the Australian tribes and is akin to that felt by conscript soldiers engaged in expeditions for which they have had no heart. It seems to have been especially strong in the Maoris, who in their prime were a proud, imaginative people, full of the love of poetry and story and of pride in the achievements of their tribes. Hopelessness and heartbreak, one must conclude from the remarkable essays by Chief Apirana Turupu Ngata, are the melancholy explanation of the fading out of existence of the once powerful and numerous Maori race.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Measuring Brain Work.

An apparatus for measuring brain effort has been made by J. L. Balbi, who suggests that the arrangement might be made to point out the proper studies for children, or those which can be pursued with the least work and most profit, says an English paper. In the center of some heat conducting material he places a thermo-electric pile, which is connected by flexible wire to a sensitive galvanometer. The slightest rise in temperature, due to rush of blood in the head, is indicated by the galvanometer, the effect, of course, increasing with the intensity of the mental work.

WORK OF A DEVOTED WOMAN.

How Miss Mance Founded the Famous Hotel Dieu in 1641.

The following romantic story was told by Dr. W. H. Kingston, of Montreal, in addressing the international medical congress:

When Jacques Cartier returned to France after his discovery of Canada the news of his exploit traveled over France as quickly as was then possible.

A French girl, young and beautiful, became impressed with the thought that the newly found country should be the scene of her labors. She succeeded after a time in fitting out a small bark with money furnished by a Mme. Bullion, and with twelve sailors crossed the Atlantic in the spring of 1641.

The sea voyage to Quebec occupied three months. It can now be accomplished in one-fifteenth of that time. The journey from Quebec to Montreal by the St. Lawrence, which can now be performed in a night, then occupied eight days. Miss Mance's bark came to an anchor at a projecting point off the Island of Montreal, then called Hochelaga.

Hochelaga was at that time the chefdieu of the warlike Hurons. They looked with amazement at the advent of palefaced men and one palefaced woman—for she was alone of her sex. They soon recovered from their surprise, however, and it was necessary for the colonists to throw up for their protection, as quickly as possible, wooden palisades on the land or rear approach; the big canoe, as the bark was styled, was a sufficiently imposing defense in front. If a colonist ventured beyond the palisades to gather fruit or berries, or to cut wood, he ran the risk of being pierced with arrows.

Half of the first colonists perished in this manner, and Miss Mance was obliged to return to France in 1649, bringing back with her other recruits, and again in 1658, leaving France with twenty male and female recruits, half of whom died on the voyage of a form of plague. In their attacks on this small force some of the red men were wounded in return, and when deserted by their comrades they were brought within the palisades to what they and their tribe considered certain death—according to their own custom in warfare.

They soon found the hospital to be a place of woman's tenderest solicitude. When the red man's wounds were healed a repast of dog's meat was prepared for him, and he was permitted to rejoin his tribe to tell what the pale faced maiden had done for him. It need not surprise us to be told that, in the presence of such devotion, the warlike Huron soon forgot his ferocity.

A few years later it was necessary for the small colony to move a few hundred yards inland. Word went throughout the Huron camp, and before the hour of departure the aborigines had strewn the ground with leaves and the branches of trees and with wild flowers, saying the earth was not fit to receive the tread of these women.

In this way our first hospital was established, and in this way the light of Christianity was brought to the Island of Montreal. Here is how the hospital has been sustained. Miss Mance had obtained from the French king a deed of gift in perpetuity of the small piece of land where she landed, which at that time was valueless. It became, however, in the course of years the center of the village of Montreal, and eventually the commercial city clustered around it.

A century and a third ago, when Canada passed from the rule of France to that of Great Britain, respect was paid by the conqueror to the rights originally conferred by the French king, and the hospital, which at first had but the aborigines for inmates, continued to receive within its walls, as colonization went on, persons of every succeeding nationality. For upward of 150 years after its foundation it alone afforded asylum to the sick and wounded of Montreal and westward.

How many from these shores when sick and disabled have there received maternal care! How many of your children, in that then faroff land, had the pillow of death smoothed for them there, and without fee or pecuniary reward! And the same continues to this day, for the property preserved to those religious ladies by a wise conqueror has, without municipal aid or government patronage, but with economy, sufficed for the wants of the institution.—British Medical Journal.

Queen Victoria's Cows.

Not a gentleman farmer in England is fonder of taking prizes at county fairs than is Queen Victoria. Of late years this has been her majesty's chief source of pleasure, and she treasures the medals won by her butter and cheese and the premiums carried off by her cattle above the gorgeous tributes of her eastern subjects or her German royal relations. When she is at Balmoral not a day passes that she does not personally inspect the home farm, as it is called, and now and then advise as to the butter and cheese making, in which she is especially interested. Her dairies are almost Dutch in their exquisite cleanliness, the box stalls being tiled in blue and white china, and the milking done by maids.

It is said that the produce of these model farms is sold in London, and that her thrifty majesty turns many an honest penny in this way. Well, if she does, what matter? It adds to the interest of farming no doubt to make it profitable, and she is to be congratulated upon her success. At Windsor a herd of American buffaloes is kept, and recently an attempt was made to cross them with some Scotch cattle.—Jenness Miller Monthly.

Feminine Bishops.

Feminine bishops are a possibility which Sir Wilfred Lawson, of conservative England, suggests—for why not, since there is no fighting to be done? A BRAVE SOLDIER.

Lord Wolseley is the Kind of a Man That a Soldier Should be.

HE HAS A LARGE RECORD OF WOUNDS

Englands Great General Must Have Had Remarkable Vitality to Live Through so Many Encounters.

"I am worth a good many dead men yet," was the characteristic remark of the man when regarded as a "dead un" by the army doctor in the Crimea. Lord Wolseley's remarkable vitality helped him to pass with success through many such experiences, and to impress his mark on the modern military history of Great Britain in a way unequaled by any other soldier since the great Wellington died.

The career of the commander in chief of her majesty's forces in Ireland began in 1852, when, as a young enthusiastic Irish lad, he joined the army as ensign. He at once tasted blood. He passed through the Burmese war, and then returned to England. Few have had Lord Wolseley's luck, and few his ill luck. While he has won more victories than his fellows, so has he been wounded oftener than most soldiers in his position. His life has been one full of narrow escapes from death.

His first experience was ugly enough in all conscience. Burmah was the scene; and here, while heading an attacking party, young Wolseley saved himself from destruction by falling into a pit. Then, in the second attempt, he and his fellow officer were each struck in the left thigh by large iron jingal balls. His friend lived but a few minutes, while Wolseley himself needed all his strength in the fight between life and death. He recovered only to meet experiences as hard in the Crimea.

His biographer, Mr. Lowe, tells that during the progress of the Crimean war "Captain Wolseley was wounded severely on Aug. 30, and slightly on April 10 and June 7. On Feb. 15 his coat was pierced by a ball; on April 10 a round shot struck the embrasure at which he was working, and his trousers were cut, and on June 7 a ball passed through his forage cap from the peak to the back, knocking it off his head.

"It may be said without exaggeration that he bore a charmed life, for at the termination of the siege, of three messes of four members each, he was the only remaining officer in the Crimea, all the others having been killed or forced to leave through wounds."

It was not without truth that his fellow officers regarded him as possessing more lives than even the proverbial cat.

But these hairbreadth escapes from death were trivial compared to some of Lord Wolseley's other experiences. Outside Sebastopol he was giving orders to two sappers in the trenches, when "suddenly a round shot took off one man's head and drove his jawbone into the other man's face, to which it adhered, bespattering the party with blood." Aug. 30 was a bloody day in the trenches.

A sortie by the Russians, successful for the moment, made it important that the gap opened by the attack should be repaired. Wolseley and two sappers began the work of repair, but their labor was stopped by the appearance of a round shot, which struck the gabion, "which was full of stones, and striking its contents with terrific force, instantly killed the poor fellows by his side, the head of one being taken off, while the other was disemboweled." Wolseley did not escape. Thrown senseless to the ground, he lay for a time as one dead. At length he came to himself, staggered to the doctor's hut, and again fell unconscious. It was then that the doctor said, "He's a dead un." This roused Wolseley, who, turning in his blood, said, "I am worth a good many men yet."

The young captain's wounds on this occasion presented a shocking appearance. The doctor fancied, after probing the wound, that his jawbone was shattered, but Wolsely made him pull out the substance in his mouth, when a large stone came away. The surgeon then lifted up and stitched the cheek.

Both his eyes were completely closed, and the injury done to one of them was so serious that the sight has been permanently lost. Not a square inch of his face but was battered and cut about, while his body was wounded all over, just as if he had been peppered with small shot. He had received also a severe wound on his right leg, so both his limbs had now been injured. The wound in the left thigh received in Burmah rendered him slightly lame.

Many opportunities have since been given him of fulfilling the instructions often delivered by Sir Hope Grant in China, "Take Wolseley; he will do the work for you." It is certain, too, that he has thoroughly acted throughout life up to his own dictum—that the only way for a young man to get on in the army is to try and get killed in every way he possibly can.

Three years after the close of the Crimean war Wolseley was ordered to China. Wrecked on the way, he made for India, and greatly distinguished himself in the suppression of the Indian mutiny. For one of his deeds he deserved an honor which every soldier most cherishes—the Victoria Cross. Lord Wolseley has himself told the story. He was leading the storming party against the Metee Mohul in November, 1857, which opened up the way into the Lucknow residency, when Private Andrews, of his own company, "one of the very bravest private soldiers" he knew, fell wounded.

Wolseley at once took the stricken man in his arms and made a rush for shelter. Before reaching a friendly house, however, poor Andrews was again shot by a bullet intended by a rebel Sepoy for his rescuer. The end of the mutiny saw Wolseley, at the age of twenty-six, a lieutenant colonel. An experience in China came after, to be followed by his appointment in 1861 as quartermaster general in Canada. Years of quiet elapsed until the Red River expedition and the Ashantee war, when Wolseley became known among the natives against whom he fought as "the general who never stops."

He came out of the Ashantee campaign a major general. A rest of five years brought him to the wars in Zululand, the Egyptian campaign, Tel el Kebir and a peerage, and, in 1884, the war in the Soudan, when he was only forty-eight hours too late to save General Gordon.—Million.

In Greenland.

Happy Greenland! There are no lawyers in that region of ice and snow. If one man injures another, he is summoned to a drum dance, and there the accuser strives to make him ludicrous by singing songs in his dispraise. Should the accuser prove a better poet or vocalist and gain the applause of the audience the matter is then decided, and the litigants shake hands and swear eternal friendship.

FRIDAY, AUG. 3.....1894

The stockmen of the San Juaquin valley have this year presented strong appeals to the officials at Washington for permission to graze their cattle and sheep in the National parks that have been reserved in in the Sierra Nevada mountains. Their petitions have been endorsed by the business men of the State and have received careful and patient attention but no relief has been granted and feed is now going to waste on these government lands, under the protection of United States troops, that would fatten thousands of sheep and save many men from threatened bankruptcy. There is shown a disposition in some quarters to hold the present administration responsible for the condition of things, just as many hold it responsible for all other annoyances of business as well as for dry seasons, wet seasons and hot weather. But reasonable and intelligent men do not do this. They hold the officials of the government responsible for the uniform enforcement of the laws that the people have enacted through their representatives. The people themselves are responsible for the laws. Now the laws under which the stockmen are shut out of the National parks in the Sierras were passed in 1890, when the Republicans were in power in both houses of Congress and when Benjamin Harrison was President of the United States. These laws prescribed regulations for the government and management of these National parks, and the men who are in charge of them have nothing to do but to see that the laws, which they have sworn to execute, are faithfully executed. Those men have no choice or discretion in the matter. The officials of the Interior Department at Washington also have their action in the matter clearly defined, and there is no help in the circumstances. But the stockmen of California, whose flocks are suffering for the feed that is going to waste, should reflect that the same Congress which enacted the McKinley law enacted these laws. They are Republican measures, and the only mitigation of their severity which the present officials can lawfully grant is to permit men who have patented lands within these reservations to drive their stock over the government lands to reach their own lands, on which they may graze their stock, having first defined the metes and bounds of their possessions, and confining their stock to their own lands. The stockmen of California must hold the Republican party responsible for being shut out of the government reservation in the Sierras, not the Democratic, and they should give the Democratic Administration the credit of mitigating, as much as can lawfully be done, the severity of the laws that they feel are so unjust and so unnecessary.

Four years ago in the battle which ended in the election of Colonel Markham to the governorship of this state, the two B's—Buckley and Burns—were the leaders of the opposing forces. Now they are both fighting shoulder to shoulder under the Republican banner, which presages all the worse for San Francisco, as well as for the state should they succeed in achieving a victory. San Francisco, always plundered by her officials and groaning for forty-five years under a burden of taxation that was never carried by any other city of her size, will be stripped to a skeleton before the Buckley—Burns regency can satiate its appetite.

Populism, which received its first wholesome check in the way that the people of Oregon sat down on Pennoyer in June, will continue to grow weaker as election day approaches. Kansas, which is nothing if not emotional, being peopled with a race of fanatics in the very first place, will probably re-elect Llewelling, but beyond that there is not a state they can claim with any degree of certainty.

Los Angeles county threatens to quarantine against Tulare and Kern county horses in consequence of the prevalence of glanders among them. The authorities in the counties mentioned should take steps to stamp out the disease.

THE WIND OF THE DEAD MEN'S FEET.

Oh, "wind of the dead men's feet," blow softly.
Disturb not thou their rest.
Why should ye waken them from quiet slumber
Within earth's toil worn breast?

The day will come when, like a mighty ocean
Which rolls from pole to pole,
Resistless thou wilt sweep the nations over,
And then must every soul

Prepare to meet the One, who, following after,
Appeareth in the east,
And wakeneth all men from death's dreamless slumber,
The greatest and the least.

So, "wind of the dead men's feet," blow softly,
Until shall dawn that day
When, strong and terrible, thou wilt give warning
That all things pass away.

Napoleon's Hats.

Careful inquiry has led to the discovery that there are no fewer than nine of Napoleon I's hats still in existence. A writer in The Vie Contemporaine gives a list of them. One is in the possession of Mme. Claitte, whose grandfather, General Giraud, picked it up at Marengo. At a critical moment Bonaparte started off at a gallop, and the wind blowing off his hat he did not stop to pick it up.

Another of the hats is in a little crypt beside Napoleon's tomb at the Invalides. This was worn on the 7th, 8th and 9th of February, 1807, at Eilau, and it is the identical one represented in the colossal picture of the battle by Gros, to be seen in the Louvre. During the peace which succeeded the battle Gros was commissioned to paint the picture, and in order that the figure of the emperor might be faithfully depicted the hat was given to the painter.

At the death of Gros in 1835 it was found under a glass case upon a wooden stand, and it was sold by auction among the painter's effects for 2,047 francs 50 centimes to Dr. Delacroix, who presented it to Louis Philippe. The later, after the famous second funeral of Napoleon, ordered it to be placed beside the remains with the emperor's crosses and the sword he wore at Austerlitz. Of the remaining hats one belongs to Prince Victor Napoleon and another to the museum at Gotha.—London News.

Atomic Principles.

A side light is being thrown on the nature of the elements by the chemico-physical discussion between Armstrong and Hartly as to the connection existing in the constitution of certain organic compounds and the colors they exhibit. We may take it as an established fact that a relation exists. And if so, then why may not elements of distinct and characteristic color be considered as complexes analogous to definitely decomposable substances? The two elements, nickel and cobalt, of decided color in their salts and in their metallic plates, add strength to this idea in that they may be considered as exhibiting a sort of isomerism. Their atomic weights are the same within limits of experimental error, and by analogy with compounds identity of atomic weight implies dissimilarity in constitution and therefore definite structure.—Science.

The Ocean Telephone Possible.

Professor Silvanus P. Thompson is one of those who believe that ocean telephony is not only possible, but that the means of attaining it are within our grasp. Telephone cables for the deep sea will, however, require to be made on a different plan from the existing telegraph cables—that is to say, a single conductor of stranded copper insulated and surrounded by an iron sheathing that comes between the outgoing wire and the water which serves as the return part of the circuit. The going and return wires will have to lie side by side within the sheathing. Moreover, the whole circuit will probably have to be broken up into sections which are capa- of acting upon each other by mutual induction.—London Globe.

Cause and Effect.

May—Don't you think that Miss Golightly is perfectly charming?

Mamma—It struck me that she was a little bit giddy.

May—Why, mamma, she moves in the best circles.

Mamma—That accounts for it. Moving in circles will make any one giddy. —New York Herald.

A Novel Revenge.

Cook—Yes, my mistress is a prima donna and a horrible creature. She treats me like the dirt beneath her feet, but I revenge myself by opening the drawing room window when she is not at home and by howling with all my might, so that the neighbors may think her voice is cracked.—Fliegende Blatter.

Bound to Be Ladylike.

Ethel—What did you do when Gus proposed to you?

Mabel—I was so surprised I puckered up my mouth to whistle, but then I remembered that would be unladylike, so I hurried and pressed my lips against his to keep myself from whistling.—Good News.

Which is the better, something or nothing? This depends. When it stimulates, it is of use; when it enervates, it is mischievous. The young man who prefers idleness above an unpleasant job, seeing that he has a dollar or two in his pocket, is in danger.

War chariots appeared for the last time during the Persian invasion of Greece. They were abandoned then because the horses got frightened, and running away often threw large bodies of troops into confusion.

It appears from a treasury statement that there are 36,880 $10,000 bills, 14,805 $5,000 bills and 47,324 $1,000 bills in circulation in this country.

The mace used by the speaker of the house of representatives is made of 13 ebony rods twined together and held in place by silver bands.

Committee Meeting.

A meeting of the Inyo County Democratic Central Committee is hereby called to meet at Independence, Cal., on Monday, August 13, 1894, at 7:30 o'clock p. m., for the purpose of selecting the time and place for holding the County Convention, and setting a day upon which the primaries are to be held, and attending to any other business that may come before said Committee. It is urgently requested that all Committeemen attend.

A. W. EIBESHUTZ, Chairman.
IRV. H. MULHOLLAND, Sec'y.

Inyo County was awarded the first prize for honey at the Mid-winter fair, a gold medal being awarded to B. M. Leete of Bishop. It is all the more creditable to the excellence of the product from the fact that the honey in question was purchased by the committee in the San Francisco market, where it had been shipped for sale. It was not selected especially for exhibition purposes.

Pat. Keyes returned yesterday morning to his mine in the Inyo range. While here he shipped over $500 worth of bullion, the result of a run of six tons of ore in his arrastra. He has more ore ready for reduction and will start the arrastra running at once. There is no doubt but that he has a good mine. He expects to put in a five-stamp mill soon, when the output will be greatly increased.

George Mead and Rudolph Schober went south to-day with their 14-animal team en route for Mojave. They will stop at the borax marsh on their way down and take in a load of borax to Mojave and load there with freight for points in Owens Valley. They will be back in twenty days.

Pete Rasmussen came up from Inyo yesterday. He received a severe burn on the left eye last week and will take a vacation until he recovers. While here he improved the opportunity to become a citizen of the United States.

Judge Davidson desires us to state that in the preliminary examination of Hines and son he did not require the presence of the District Attorney, and that he was within call at the time had his services been required.

J. K. Pendergrass, E. Downey, Frank Kimball and Erle Kimball came down from Onion Valley on Wednesday and went to Lone Pine intending to return home by way of Kern River and Mineral King.

Curtis Fuller and G. B. Commetti came down from Fish Spring Hill on Tuesday. Mr. Commetti brought down fifty-eight ounces of gold bullion which he has taken from his mine in the last few weeks.

County Clerk Hession started for Darwin and the lower end of the county by this afternoon's train. Mr. Hession will interview the voters in that section and see that his fences are in good order.

Carl Walter of Camp Independence left on yesterday's train for Williams, Colusa County, where he will join his brother. Carl is certain to make many friends in his new home.

Miss Ada Lewis and her niece Miss Ada Samuels returned to San Francisco on last Saturday's train after a pleasant visit with relatives at Independence.

Tom Webb came down from Long Valley early in the week. He reports that the stockmen there are having a very successful season.

State Board of Trade.

The State Board of Trade has secured elegant new quarters at 575 Market Street, San Francisco. Many of the counties that maintained exhibits at the Midwinter Fair have contributed liberally from their displays, and the Board is now installing one of the most magnificent collections of home products ever maintained west of the Rocky Mountains. The extent, grandeur and beauty of the exhibit at the Board's new rooms must be seen to be appreciated, and all visitors to the city are cordially invited to call and see it. A resting room for guests is provided, and an apartment is set off for the convenience of interior editors who may be visiting the city.

The present management of the Board is ambitious to extend its usefulness, and will put forth renewed exertions in the direction of promoting the settlement and up-building of California. In this work the co-operation of every live county, every progressive community, and every enterprising man in the State is desired. Supervisors and other county officers, city Mayors and city Trustees from any part of the State, are specially invited to call and see the display, and learn something of the nature and scope of the work which the State Board of Trade is doing. "Upward and onward" is the motto, and in every movement for the upbuilding of California the State Board of Trade will aim to be in the lead.

Among other projects which the Board has devised for the convenience of strangers who desire homes in California, is one which contemplates a listing of all the improved and unimproved places that are for sale in the State. Any person who has a place for sale can send to the State Board of Trade for suitable blanks for a description of the property, price, etc., which blanks, after being filled out, are to be returned to the Board's headquarters, where they will be kept in book form, by counties, for the convenience of the many people who call their daily for just such information as said description will afford. By this means new comers will be facilitated in their search for homes, and those who have land for sale will be assisted in their search for buyers. This work, instead of interfering with the business of real estate men, as some have suggested, will be found in practice to promote interest in their respective localities and increase their business. Address all communications to J. A. Filcher, Secretary.

Mazourka Mines.

The mines at Mazourka Canyon are already proving an important factor in the sales of local merchants. Last Sunday a six-horse team left Independence loaded with supplies for the miners there. Already several thousand dollars worth of gold has been taken out and the force of men at work is increasing daily. So far most of the work has been done in the small ravines leading into the main canyon where the bed rock is within a foot or two of the surface. But Messrs. Roeper and Robinson are sinking a shaft in the main canyon, and should this prove successful a permanent camp will be the result. The pay ground covers an extensive territory and affords a field for a large number of men.

CHAPTER VI.

SOCIETY ENTERTAINS THE NEW DIVA.

The Cadwalader Dinsmores are people such as can exist (as a social fact) nowhere but in America, and, indeed, in New York. Mr. Dinsmore (called Wallie Dinsmore by every one who knows him) is a man of paramount though unobtrusive usefulness. He is—or for the sake of the unities let us say he was—a gentleman of medium size, plain exterior and remarkable quietness of speech and demeanor. He was like the heart of peace in the midst of the fashionable social whirlwind, the undemonstrative center of all demonstrations, the reposeful culmination of all activities. To say that he knew everybody and everything, not only that everybody else knew, but that everybody else would like to know, but imperfectly expressed his accomplishments. He lived in New York, but he was at home in all countries and in all societies, and occasionally was met with in all.

He was about forty-two years of age, but looked younger, having light hair and a subdued reddish complexion, and he seemed, when you considered his experience and serenity, indefinitely or in fact infinitely older. He had unexceptionable manners, was genial, kindly, gently humorous and insensibly entertaining. He never was detected making an effort, and he never forbore an effort to be obliging. He was as accurate as a pendulum, and as versatile as a continent. He could neither play, sing, act, make a speech, write a book, nor paint a picture; but no one knew better than he how all these things ought to be done, or was more sympathetically appreciative of others' attempts to do them. He smiled easily, but always as if he could not help it. His laugh was a low, contagious chuckle, and seemed to suggest an unexpected charm and drollery in life. There was a manly, masculine look and quality about his plain face and ordinary figure, and in the tone and utterance of his voice. You felt that there was substance in him when required—that he was by no means a phantom of conventions and escapes—that, when everything else had been eliminated from him, a gentleman would remain.

He was a great favorite with women and with children, and his relations with the former were just as cordial and simple as with the latter. If you dropped in to see him during a morning you were sure to find a number of men whom it was particularly worth while to meet, sitting about in the easy chairs and smoking Wallie's famous cigars and cigarettes. He had a fine old fashioned house down in West Twenty-third street and plenty of money, which he knew how to spend; that is, he was both generous and economical.

But the most remarkable thing about Wallie Dinsmore was that, instead of being in fact the bachelor uncle of society that he was in spirit, he was actually and conspicuously married. Mrs. Cadwalader Dinsmore (they never called her Mrs. Wallie) was a few years older than her husband and weighed about fifty pounds more than he. She was mighty and imposing, convincing and memorable. Upon her massive countenance, which had the texture and hue of the finest pink-and-white enamel, was fixed immutably a gracious smile, which served to condense, as it were, into manageable dimensions the else too ponderous acreage of her cheeks and to refine the contour of her scarlet lips. Her hair, of a dense yellow hue, without a thread of gray, was arranged in an inscrutable manner, upon what might be termed the cylindrical principle; it resembled a carving in varnished maple; it looked brittle.

As for her figure, Mrs. Cadwalader might have stood for the capstan of a three decker, round which the jovial seamen trip as they heave the mighty anchor. Her voice, meanwhile, was small, soft and caressing, and she regarded her interlocutor with a glance of indulgent coquetry, as if to mitigate the terror of her proportions, though it really rendered them only more alarming. Nor was her usual talk, as might have been expected, about devouring quarter beeves, or causing earthquakes, or obliterating populations, but about embroidered handkerchiefs, and summer zephyrs blowing on wild roses and the holiness of infants' slumber. Was she, then, a sardonic humorist, or a fool buried alive in flesh? No; she was a hard hearted, practical, shrewd woman, with sharp eyes, a politic disposition and unrelenting determination.

The fact that she was not of aristocratic or indeed discoverable lineage may have sharpened her claws, so to speak, and steeled her heart; she had had to fight her own way, and was a little too much alive to the value of the worldly objects she had striven for. The most telling success she had ever scored was, of course, her marriage with Wallie Dinsmore. How she contrived it is not known; but it must have been, in every sense, easier to embrace her fifteen years ago than now. Wallie was the most humane of mankind, generously appreciative of everything except his own value. At any rate the thing took place, and Mrs. Cadwalader proved to be an admirable and substantial wife.

She made war upon none of his hobbies; she broke up none of his habits; she sacrificed none of his bachelor friends; she kept out of his way except when she could be of use to him, and then she was always ready. She made him pay, as the vernacular hath it, but she let it cost him nothing. In short, though she and her husband had almost no tastes or traditions in common, they were completely in harmony, had no children, and were a model of New York domestic virtue, happiness and prosperity. It is no small thing for a husband to be able to affirm that his wife has not had his study dusted for a week, nor launched even an oblique criticism at his African lemur.

Such as they were the Cadwalader Dinsmores made up their minds to extend the right hand of hospitality to Mlle. Marana. Mrs. Cadwalader called on her in person, and Wallie, as a matter of course, in the shape of his name written on a piece of pasteboard. The diva's acceptance having been secured the other invitations were issued, and the day arrived.

"You will have to put in an appearance," said Wallie to Geoffrey Bellingham during the previous week. "You built the opera house, and decency demands it."

"The more reason why not," the architect replied. "I should have to be introduced, and I don't care for it."

"You will have to come," the other repeated calmly. "Do you want the woman to be disrespectable?"

"It's none of my business."

"It is. A woman is what her associates are. If respectable people don't receive her they are to blame if she cuts up."

"If she were a novice—but she's notorious!"

"You affect Pharisecism in imitation of your Puritan ancestors. But this poor girl is neither a witch nor a Quaker. Her notoriety comes from her genius; the rest is mere hearsay, which it's none of your business to attend to. I intend that she shall leave New York without a spot on her reputation, and you must bear a hand. Otherwise you're not the fellow I took you for." Wallie knew Bellingham better and had more influence over him than any one else, and the end of it was that Bellingham consented to come.

There were less than twenty persons at the dinner. The dining room walls were of a soft Indian red hue, the wood work being mahogany and maple. The flowers on the table were yellow and blue. The room was lighted by tinted wax candles, each provided with a little colored shade. Everything looked cool, fresh and sweet. The host and hostess received their guests in the adjoining drawing room. By previous arrangement Mlle. Marana and Mrs. Bemax were the first to arrive. The diva was dressed in something white, of a lithe and feathery effect, giving the impression of a beautiful great bird. Her heart was up, for this was her first irrevocable step in her assumed personality. She was a high spirited girl, and having entered upon her course she had laid aside fear and irresolution.

Whatever she did she would do with her might. Such a vision of purity and loveliness as she was did not often enter a New York drawing room. She gave her hand first to Mrs. Cadwalader and then to Wallie. The latter grasped it cordially, and seemed about to say something, but suddenly checked himself, and looked at her with an odd, perplexed expression, like a man who is taken by surprise. Doubtless so much beauty would be a surprise to any one. After a moment's hesitation he said, "I'm glad to welcome you to this country, mademoiselle. I hope you will learn to feel like an American as much as you already look like one."

"Thank you; if it is American to feel happy then I am one," she answered, and it was observable as she spoke that this foreign lady's pronunciation was remarkably accurate. Wallie forbore to make the observation, however; he only took his chin between his thumb and forefinger with a quietly smiling look.

Mrs. Cadwalader said: "What delicious lace, Mademoiselle Marana! It is like frost work on ivory. Will you take a cup of tea?"

Mlle. Marana declined, and presently the other guests began to arrive.

There was Mr. Barcliffe, a wool merchant, but for social purposes an amateur composer. He was a small, slender, lively man, with gray hair and an immense gray mustache, like a great bar across the lower part of his face; he had the air of always standing on tiptoe to peep across this bar with a sportive, twinkling expression. There was Mr. Bidgood, a rosy, roistering, spherical personage, bald headed and short of breath; he smiled at you with a penetrating look, as if there were a private joke between you and himself which it would not do to mention.

There was Mr. Grasmere, tall, courtly and romantic, with a resonant voice and an occasional gleam from beneath his upper eyelids, as if his soul were kindling within him. He had been a lawyer by profession, but had married well, and was now the proprietor of an artistic weekly. There was Mr. Knight, a distinguished politician with fresh complexion, clear cut features, powerful black eyes and snow white hair; his bearing was covertly condescending, as though he were reluctant to have you realize how greatly he was your superior. There was Mr. Damon, also white haired and white bearded, a somewhat unsuccessful publisher, but gifted with a warm heart, a keen wit and a bitter tongue. There was a certain unconventional wrath and heat about him, mixed with laughter and mockery, and nothing seemed to delight him so much as to shock a fastidious person or to bully a humbug.

There was Mr. Plainter, a gentleman all profile and eyeglasses, with a grating voice, a retentive memory and an insatiable earnestness. He was president of the American branch of the Society for the Scientific Investigation of Supernatural Phenomena, and his normal condition was one of high argument and exposition. He spoke of himself as "we," and of the rest of the world as "you"—imparting to that pronoun an intonation significative of bigotry and prejudice. His neck projected forward, and his figure was thin and curved like the new moon. There was Mr. Beaufort, once a clergyman, now an actor, a large headed, small bodied man, with a big nose and deep set eyes, extremely graceful and deliberate in his attitudes and gestures, wearing in repose an expression of thoughtful melancholy, as if reflecting that he had been a clergyman, but brightening, when addressed, with a smile of almost excessive sweetness, as if remembering that he was an actor.

Such of these gentlemen as possessed wives were accompanied by them, but the latter were for the most part like the engravings of ladies in fashion papers—though their faces might be pretty, it was the dresses you looked at and recollected. When an American lady is distinguished at all she is apt to appear almost too much so. Not to mention the hostess of the evening, there were, for example, Mrs. March, of the Women's Political association, slim, erect, holding her elbows close to her sides, with a tight business mouth and yearning, melancholy eyes; possessing an insufferable command of language, enhanced by a faculty of seeming to repress more than she uttered; Miss Korner, of German extraction, with short, sandy hair, pale, prominent eyes, a snub nose and protruding jaw; her volubility was as great as that of Mrs. March, and her rapidity greater; but whereas the former lady's conversation was mainly explanatory and argumentative, Miss Korner's was interrogatory and anecdotical; Mrs. Bright, a beauty, the wife of a wealthy brewer, holding herself as if she were on horseback, rushing at a topic or an enterprise as if it were a five barred gate, and forgetting it the next moment, headstrong, enthusiastic, blase; she had embraced Herbert Spencer during the last season, and reproduced him in jets and sparkles; Mrs. Musgrave, the dramatic reader. But why continue? The peculiarity of New York society is that no two people are alike; you have to focus yourself anew for every person you meet; whereas abroad the difficulty is to distinguish Mr. Smith from Mr. Brown and Mrs. Jones from Mrs. Robinson. People there seem to be born, bred and molded in platoons; the various social grades each has the same traditions, the same prospects, the same resources, the same topics of conversation, the same tailors, and the same faces.

But in New York we have not settled down yet; our people have what may be called a New York look, but there is no New York type—the former being a trick of facial expression merely; the latter a matter of feature and structure. But we are preparing to people a hemisphere, while the European nations have to pack themselves together like sardines in a box, or pickles in a jar, mathematically, economically and irrevocably, and by natural selection have long since lost their elbows and idiosyncrasies. We are all elbows on this side of the water, especially since we have ceased any longer to be all fists and shoulders.

In addition to the guests above mentioned there were several of our older acquaintances—Gen. Inigo, Hamilton Jocelyn and Bellingham. When dinner was announced Wallie Dinsmore took in Mlle. Marana and seated her at his right hand, and it turned out that Bellingham sat next below her, much to his displeasure. He told himself that he owed Wallie one. On the other side of him sat Mrs. Bright, whom, indeed, he had taken into the table. The other gentlemen thought that Bellingham had nothing to complain of. Mrs. Bright, who could interest herself about almost anything, provided it did not last more than an hour or so, noticed that her companion was good looking, and determined to exploit him on the subject of architecture. She had read Ruskin's "Stones of Venice," and had seen classic and mediæval antiquities abroad.

Accordingly she rode at him with great dash and courage, and at first he answered her graciously enough. Before long, however, he perceived that she did not know the meaning of her own information, and then he became laconic. Young Mrs. Bright, on the other hand, was not accustomed to rebuffs, and Bellingham's reticence only stimulated her enterprise. She sparkled on like cataract in a rainbow, determined that he should fall in love with her at any rate. Meanwhile his other ear was being visited occasionally by the low and varied music of a voice the freshest and most melodious, he thought, he had ever listened to.

Wolfe Tone.

A desultory and enormous reader of plays and novels, with an impish humor and a facility and felicity of quotation which never deserted him under the most terrific circumstances, Tone's style is throughout literary and in that sense artificial, but he had a passion for facts and a healthy determination to see things as they really were. He is perfectly free from every kind of illusion, delusion and humbug.

He is very much alive to the humorous side of all things, including himself. The diaries are full of entries like this:

"I cannot help this morning thinking of Gil Blas when he was secretary to the Duke of Lerma. Yesterday I dined with Carnot. Today I should be puzzled to raise a guinea."

Wolfe Tone at the bottom of his heart was grave enough. His death is warrant for this. But he belonged by the order of his mind to the mockers. Tone's widow, though she had doubtless a good deal to put up with, mourned her husband's loss for 17 years, when she married one who shared her veneration for Tone's memory. His son grew up to be proud of his father's sufferings in what he was taught to believe was a good cause. Ireland has never forgotten Tone and probably never will.

A Substitute for Kissing.

To some members of the community it may be a shock to learn that kissing is doomed. Fashion, in the shape of the New York woman, has decided that it is high time to abolish the custom among women, and it is only a matter of time before the humblest and the most gushing among them must yield. For some time past there has been a lack of the indiscriminate embracing in public for which we were once criticised, but now the fin de siecle woman is carrying the reform into her home. Even in solitude she does not kiss her friend.

There is, however, a very pretty substitute for the tabooed embrace. Mrs. Manhattan now gives Miss Murray Hill a gentle tap on the shoulder and murmurs, "Consider yourself kissed!" and Miss Murray Hill then trips thankfully away with the sentiment in her heart, and, what is much more important to her, with her vest and bangs in good order and in the right place.—New

REMOVE STIFFNESS.

None are so quick to see the advantage of a remedy as those who may be called on at any time to avail themselves of it. In witness of this J. E. Sullivan, Secretary of the Amateur Athletic Union, President of the Pastime Athletic Club, and Athletic Editor of The Sporting Times, writes:

"For years I have been actively connected with athletic sports. I always found it to my advantage to use ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS while in training, as they quickly remove soreness and stiffness; and when attacked with any kind of pains, the result of slight colds, I always used ALLCOCK'S with beneficial results. I have noticed that most athletes of the present day use nothing else but ALLCOCK'S PLASTERS."

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

By local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Usually involves sea sickness. When the waves play pitch and toss with you, strong indeed must be the stomach that can stand it without revolting. Tourists, commercial travelers, yachtsmen, mariners, all testify that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is the best remedy for the nausea experienced in rough weather on the water. Nervous and weakly travelers by land often suffer from something akin to this, and find in the bitters its surest remedy. No disorder of the stomach, liver or bowels is so obstinate that it may not be overcome by the prompt and thorough remedy. Equally efficacious is it for chills and fever, kidney and rheumatic trouble and nervousness. AN OLD VIOLIN.

Behold this rare Cremona. Master it;
'Twill sing as 'twere an angel, but to hands
Unskilled 'tis but for mantel rubbish fit—
Old, worth so much. One reads and understands
'Twas wont to shake men's hearts, as when the wind
Sets all the leaves a-quiver. Now it lies
With all its sweet soul mute and undivined,
Priced at so much. A soul for sale, who buys?

One says 'tis scratched and ugly, gummed and stained;
He can buy handsomer for less. No doubt!
Another spies a crack or real or feigned;
A third notes fraud, is pleased to point it out.
Endure, endure, thou master's child! Even so
Are noble spirits carped at, all unknown.
While in their hearts divinely swell and flow
The harmonies which genius hears alone.

JOE'S WIFE.

Dr. Ford was driving home in the twilight after working hard all day, tired and anxious as to the result of an important operation performed that morning. The mud spattered up from the streets as he rolled along, and the chilling November drizzle gave to the trees a forlorn, almost ghastly aspect. His heart warmed as he pictured to himself a wife watching for him with a welcome smile from their cozy parlor, dinner ready, and a long, restful evening before them.

But as he drew near home no cheerful light streamed from door or window. All seemed as dark and deserted as the dripping street. He threw the reins to the boy whose duty it was to hold the horse on his professional rounds, and flung open the door with an irritated, injured feeling.

No tender smile; no sympathetic voice; no firelight; no dinner apparently.

"Elinor!" he called.

No answer.

"Elinor!"

This time a voice spoke out of the darkness—a tired voice:

"Do be more quiet, John; the baby is just going to sleep."

"Confound it! Why isn't there a light here? And why isn't the baby asleep before this time of night?"

"He has been fretful all day with his teeth, and I have not had a chance to change my dress."

A wailing cry from the nursery sent the voice hurrying thither, and the doctor, with some inaudible words, proceeded to light the gas and take off his wet overcoat. The house was cold; the parlor had evidently been arranged by Hibernian hands; an odor of something burning stole in from the kitchen. A pleasant reception for a man after a long day's work.

He ran up stairs with no gentle footstep. His wife sat by the nursery fire; her face wore a weary expression, and she had on the same blue gown which she had donned for breakfast. The baby at length slept in her arms. She held up a warning finger as her husband came blundering in, but already baby's light slumber had been disturbed, and the process of soothing and singing had to be repeated for the fifteenth time.

It seemed to the young mother as if her patience could hold out no longer. It was provoking to have the little one startled from his uneasy dreams again. She knew Bridget would spoil the dinner. She had been trying all day to get down stairs to make the house pleasant with a magic touch here and there. She longed to get into a fresh gown and brush her hair, but there had been no time for her to do one of these things. Nurse was away with a sick sister, and babies always demanded more from their mothers than from any one else. They are tyrannical and know and seize every opportunity to prove their power over the anxious, half ignorant young mothers, who are happy after all to be their slaves.

When at last the dinner bell rang Mrs. Ford laid the baby in his crib, sound asleep this time, warm and lovely in his utter repose. She gave a hurried dab at her wavy hair, caught up a fresh handkerchief and ran down to join her husband, who sat at the table with a decidedly cross look on his face. He barely tasted the soup, then pushed it away in disgust.

"Burned?" asked his wife.

"Of course. Can't you smell it all over the house? Why don't you look after Bridget a little?"

"Why, John, I have hardly been down stairs today."

"Where's Hannah?"

"She went to her sister's last night."

"Oh yes; I forgot. What's this? Corned beef. Really, Elinor, have you nothing else to offer?"

"Would you like an omlet?"

"No."

"What then?"

"A beefsteak, if you have one."

Mrs. Ford rose and went to the kitchen. The girl of course had just filled up the range with fresh coal, so there was nothing to be done but make the best of the cold meat, potatoes and macaroni, followed by a desert of apple pudding and cheese.

Dr. Ford found fault with the potatoes and said he was tired of macaroni; the bread was dry and the butter not perfect. As to the pudding:

"My mother always had mince pies at this season," said he.

This was the last straw, and his wife, unusually sensitive to straws tonight, could bear no more.

"It is a pity you ever left your mother."

"I think so, too," he responded, pushing his chair back.

His wife hesitated a moment whether to run around the table and burst into tears upon her husband's shoulder or to rush up stairs and have a good cry by baby's side. She decided upon the latter course, and with quivering lip left the room and shut herself up in the nursery, where the fire was dying on the hearth and the baby breathing softly in strange contrast to her overwrought condition.

"Well it is provoking. Women always must cry and fly into a passion about trifles."

But her husband, even as he thought these words, began to feel repentant. He remembered the teething baby and the long day at home alone. In another moment he would have followed his wife upstairs and apologized for the pain he had given her. But the doorbell rang and a summons to visit a sick man at a distance sent him at once out into the wet night. And all domestic grievances were forgotten before he had driven 200 yards.

The patient lived in a squalid part of the town by the river. The darkness seemed deeper in this poor neighborhood, the rain more soaking and the wind keener. The wind swept sullenly by, a black, swollen tide, reflecting the flaring lights on the bridge. But the doctor minded this discomfort very little. He was in love with his profession, ardent and young. Besides the despised dinner had given him new courage to fight pain and death.

He entered the one room of the low house to which he had been directed with a face quite free of impatience. A woman opened the door for him—a lean, miserable creature, with pale eyes void of expression. Her thin hair hung over her neck, her calico dress fell limply from her sharp shoulders. She stared at the doctor as he entered, and he could see there were tears in her childlike eyes.

"Joe's sick," she said slowly, gazing into his face.

"What's the matter?"

"He—he's goin to die maybe," she faltered piteously.

"No, I hope not.

"Joe's sick," she repeated in a whisper, shaking her head.

"Who's come?" asked a voice from the bed in a corner of the room. "Nellie, girl, who are you talkin with?"

"It is Dr. Ford, whom you sent for," said the physician, approaching the bed.

One candle lighted dimly the untidy, comfortless place, showing a stove and a man with tumbled hair and rough beard lying among the pillows of his bed.

"Oh, the doctor," said he, with feverish eyes staring from under shaggy brows.

"How long have you been ill?" asked Dr. Ford, sitting down on a rickety chair.

"It's a week since I give up, but I've been feeling bad for a long time."

The doctor placed his little thermometer under the patient's tongue and waited silently.

"Joe's sick," moaned the girl, peering out of the shadows.

The sufferer seemed to be irritated by the repetition of these words and made an impatient gesture, but as he did so glanced pitifully at the slouching figure.

"What you need most is good nursing," said the doctor after examining the patient.

The man's face darkened. The woman hovered aimlessly over the stove.

"She's my wife," said the sick man hoarsely. "I know she ain't quite like other folks. But she's peaceable and good; not bold and noisy like other women. I pitied her first off; then I got kind o' fond of her. And she"——

The girl had crept to the bedside and stood there with her vacant, troubled face, fumbling with the pillows.

"Joe," she said, much as a mother might speak her baby's name.

"She can't do nothing more for me nor for herself," whispered the man as he clasped one of the fluttering hands in his.

"Poor thing," murmured the doctor.

"I can earn good wages when I am well," went on the invalid, "and I did the cooking and kept the house tidy then. Now everything's going wrong. She spoils all the victuals, but she don't mean to."

At this moment something on the stove boiled over with a loud hiss and filled the room with the odor of scorching milk. The girl started, then moved toward the ruined mess.

"Oh, dear me!" said the sick man under his breath. "Don't burn yourself, Nellie," he called as if to a child.

"It's scorched, Joe," she said, the tears overflowing at last.

"Never mind, my girl, throw it away. We can get plenty more. You see, doctor," he said in his hoarse voice, "I can't speak rough to her She's my wife."

The doctor sat with bent head, speechless.

"I'll send you a nurse, my man," he said after a pause. "What you need is good care. I will come again tomorrow." And with a low bow to man and wife, now clinging together hand in hand, the doctor said good night and went on his way.

"Thank you, sir," called out the sick man, much moved.

The girl started and wiped the last tear from her lashes.

Two hours later a capable, kind hearted woman was installed as nurse in the little home by the river. She brought with her food in abundance and comforts of all kinds.

Dr. Ford drove slowly homeward. Though it was late a bright light shone from the parlor window as he stopped. The glow of a wood fire illuminated the room as he entered. But no one came to meet him. His wife sat in her rocker fast asleep. The lamp threw a radiance over her bronze brown hair and one delicate cheek as she slept with head against the crimson back of the chair. Her face wore a sweet, childlike expression, with a touch of pathos about the lips, and her hands lay closely clasped in the lap of her gown of soft dove color.

Near the fire stood a white draped table holding a tempting little repast, carefully arranged. From a slender glass in the midst hung one red rose. The doctor knew she had cut it for him from her favorite plant. On a pretty plate reposed the flakiest and most delectable of mince pies.

Dr. Ford stooped and kissed his wife's fair cheek reverently. She stirred, then opened her large eyes slowly.

"Oh, you have come. I am sorry I was not awake to meet you. But here's a mince pie. I sent over to your mother for one."

"Hang the pie!" cried John Ford. "Elinor, I am a brute!"

"Oh, no, dear—only a man instead of an archangel, as I once believed you to be. But never mind. How do you like my dress?"

"It is divine and you are an angel, Elinor. But, dearest, come and sit by me. I have just been to see a gentleman. I want to tell you all about it."—Buffalo News.

The Lightninglike Loon.

The loon is the quickest living creature. A loon that has had experience can dodge the flash of a gun. You see a loon on a lake, but long before you see him he sees you and has taken a mental inventory of you and your belongings. If you have no gun, you may perhaps approach within 100 yards before he laughs at you with that horrid shriek which gives him his name and disappears under the water, but show a gun and he does not stop to laugh—he goes instanter. When in a sportive mood he sometimes waits until he sees you about ready to fire, when, at the flash, he dives, and you see the shot spatter the water where he has just gone down.

GENTEEL POOR.

"Oh, the Pity of it!" One Explains When Considering Them.

THE QUEER METHODS OF THIS CLASS

A Peculiar Anecdote About People Who Manage to Get Along and Get Along by Managing Their Dress.

Do you know that there is a class of people who suffer and of whom the world never hears? I mean those whom we are apt to call the genteel poor. They are always with us. In my life I have listened to a great many queer stories about them, and they are really to be pitied. They are, many of them, single women of uncertain age, who are obliged to live on infinitesimal incomes and with an amount of style. They can't bring their ideas down to the level of their fortunes. They have always been used to certain things, and they must have or at least appear to have them. They can live only in a particular part of town, no matter if the rent consumes the biggest part of their funds, and they must do other things in just proportion. How do they do it? Why, with an amount of ingenuity that would be valuable in a better cause.

They "manage." That is the word.

The genteel poor "manage" to get along and get along by "managing."

Take a case that I happen to know about. They were a pair of sisters who rented apartments.

I am not afraid to assert that they lived on samples. They went from one grocer to another and collected, little by little, almost all the things they needed for their meager menage.

Sample cans of soup furnished their table at many a midday meal. Their cracker jar was a wonderful mixture of different brands. They did so like a variety, they said. Their bonbon dish was replenished in a way that seemed little short of stealing. They would make periodical calls at various confectioners and at each take a bit of candy from the piles that were exposed to view. Hidden in a bag, or in a muff if it was winter, the aggregate of this booty when taken home formed quite a dishful and helped out at their afternoon receptions, which, in accordance with their ideas of hospitality and the traditions of their family, they always gave during the season.

I used to wonder how they felt when they knelt on Sundays before that gorgeous shrine which they affected and gave the response to that solemn admonition, "Thou shalt not steal," but I fancy they thought it was perfectly legitimate.

They always dressed in black, and I am sure I don't know how they "managed" their wardrobes. I suppose the bargain counters helped them out, and I fancy their gowns were sometimes made by a very swell dressmaker whom years ago they employed as a seamstress and introduced to their wealthy friends. By this the woman was enabled to get a footing, and no doubt gratitude prompted her to give them some help in the reconstruction of their wardrobes.

But this was long ago. I wonder if the younger sister, who now occupies a position as the wife of a wealthy man, is aware that I know all about the gown she wore when she met the man who emancipated her from the thraldom of petty economy. I doubt it, but I do, and I am going to tell you.

The two women had been invited to a dinner given by a swell friend. The elder could not go on account of ill health, but the younger must. Then came the question of what to wear. Everything had been exhausted, and there was no money for a costume. At last, in despair, the younger woman opened a trunk filled with clothing from the rectory—their childhood's home.

She had it! Within its depths there was the black silk robe that her father had worn. It was heavy and of beautiful texture. Its ample folds would make a short skirt and part of a waist.

While in a quandary as to what would fill out the deficiency she saw beneath the velvet pall that had covered her father's coffin. It had been the last loving tribute of a sick parishioner. Here were the train and another part of the waist.

Did no thought of its association with the dead man or remembrance of the solemn service return to her, you ask? Not a bit of it. Beneath it, crumpled up in many creases, was the crape that had draped the altar. Behold what a costume was evolved! A long train of velvet over a skirt of heavy black silk trimmed with folds of crape, whose somber blackness served to make still whiter the neck displayed beneath the decollete corsage. She was elegant indeed, and at the dinner she played her cards so well that she captured an extremely eligible bachelor, and her struggles were over.

But think of it! I know you'll say, "Oh, the pity of it!"

You have often heard the saying: "God help the rich. The poor can beg."

I say the Lord's poor will be taken care of, but pity, oh, pity, the genteel poor!—Boston Herald.

A Real Swell.

The tramp had called at a house where there had been a party the night before and had been given a very good meal at the kitchen table, with the lady of the house superintending the feast. She was a good hearted woman, and thinking the wanderer might appreciate a dainty she had added a dish of ice cream to the menu. She put a spoon beside it, and in a minute or two he was ready for it and she stood by to note his enjoyment.

"I beg your pardon, mum," he said as he picked up the spoon, "will you be kind enough to give me a fork to eat this cream with?" and the good woman almost collapsed.—Detroit Free Press.

A Tribute to the Horse.

SUPPLIES FOR TYPEWRITERS.

Mysteries of the Processes for Making Ink Ribbons and Manifolding Papers.

The manufacture of typewriting supplies is a first class mystery. It would seem that the making of such articles as ink ribbons, carbon paper and manifold paper is hedged around with secrets. The proprietary value of the various brands on the market consists in the private knowledge of processes which are explained to nobody.

Typewriter ribbons of the best sort are made out of the finest cotton ribbon, which is bought in large rolls. They vary in width from five-sixteenths of an inch to an inch and a half. Some ribbons are cut out of cotton cloth, but this is an inferior method. The ribbon is soaked in liquid ink, being subsequently rubbed very thoroughly in order to distribute the ink through all the fibres. Finally it is subjected to a process of polishing, which renders it possible to handle the ribbon without much smut.

The most important point is the composition of the ink, the ingredients of which are kept secret. It is mixed with oil and glycerine to keep it from getting dry. Two kinds of inks are used for the ribbons. That employed for ordinary ribbons contains such insoluble pigments as logwood or prussian blue or lampblack. But the ink for copying ribbons must be composed with soluble colors, usually aniline dyes.

After being soaked, rubbed and polished the ribbon is cut into lengths of from five to eighteen yards, according to the machines on which they are intended to be used. Lastly each ribbon is wrapped in silver paper or tin foil and put into a pasteboard box. However, the newest thing is to sell each ribbon wound on a little reel inside of a tin box. Durability is the quality chiefly demanded in typewriter ribbons. The process of applying the ink requires great skill. If there is too much it will smut.

Carbon paper, for manifolding on the typewriter, is so difficult to make that it is exceptional to find any that is first rate. It is manufactured simply by combining lampblack and undrying oils with suitable paper. How to accomplish this successfully is a problem on which a vast amount of labor and money have been expended.

Manifold tissue paper, such as the press associations and syndicate correspondents use for sending out their news and letters, as many as sixteen good copies being struck off at a single touch of the type key, is made from the best cotton and manilla stock. Animal oil is distributed over the paper by machinery specially made for the purpose. But as to what kind of animal the oil is obtained from and how the machine works nobody outside of the business knows.—Washington Star.

Some Good Things About Serving as Juror.

There is hardly a more unwelcome visitor than the man who serves jury notices, and hardly a more disgruntled set of men than talesmen who appear in court at the beginning of each term in which jury cases are tried. Yet the misfortune is not without its compensations. A leading federal official said the other day in regard to this:

My friends often come to me and ask me to have them released from jury duty. I tell them that in the first place I have no such power, and in the second place they are making a mistake in wishing to escape serving. I don't need to say anything about the duty of every citizen in this respect, but tell my friends that the time spent in the courtroom will by no means be wasted. They will gain a knowledge of law, especially if in a criminal court, that will be very helpful to them. They will learn some of the tricks of swindlers and thieves, and will be better prepared to guard against them. Then the service will give them a view of the criminal classes that they would never get otherwise. They would become more charitable at seeing the atmosphere of vice and crime in which so many are reared, and at understanding the temptations which prove too much for men of good reputations.

In the courtroom they can study human nature of a kind with which they never come in contact elsewhere. In short, jury service is instructive, broadening and elevating, and the inconvenience it often causes might well be forgotten in the advantages.—New York Tribune.

Marriage and Good Times.

"I have observed," says an old minister, "that marriage, especially among the working classes, is greatly affected by the state of trade. When trade is good marriages increase, and are less frequent in times of commercial depression. This fact indicates that the romance of life among a class who are generally regarded as reckless in the matter of marriage, is, after all, restrained by the dictates of common prudence. During the Lancashire cotton famine, early in the sixties, I had a church in Dundee. The failure of cotton occasioned an abnormal boom in the jute trade, and Dundee was the principal emporium for the import and manufacture of the flexible fiber. It was then that that town laid the foundation of its wealth and greatness. In those prosperous times marriages were frequent, and in the course of a few years I united in the sacred bonds of matrimony a greater number of young couples than in any similar period during my ministerial career."—Glasgow Herald.

Where Bells Are Cast.

We not only use many chimes in this country, but make them. Troy is the great American center for producing church chimes. The Troy bells are said to equal the most celebrated chimes of Europe in everything but age and historical association. The ten bells of St. Thomas' church were made in Troy and were put up in 1874. There are ten also in Grace church chime, the largest—which is called the rector's bell and is always used for tolling—weighing 2,835 pounds. The Grace church chime cost $8,000.—New York Sun.

A PAIR OF PANTS.

A Garment That has Drifted all Around the North Pole.

A STORY TOLD BY PROF. HEILPRIN.

A Lost Pair of Trousers Belonging to a Sailor has Mapped Out a Route Through the Northern Seas.

The history of a pair of trousers that have been around the north pole, according to scientists' theories, enlivened the subject of the arctic problem, as handled by Professor Angelo Heilprin before a large gathering of Geographical club members at the Century club's hall. The garments, it seems, were the property of a sailor who accompanied an expedition to the north by way of Behring sea. How the apparel got into the current presumed to set in some distance above the frigid line did not appear, but Professor Heilprin described the way in which it traveled day after day, as geographers believe, far to the impenetrable north, swept around the pole, crossed it perhaps, until it entered the northern ocean boundary of Greenland and came down its snow lined coast into the comparatively beaten track that made its discovery easy.

The professor illustrated his remarks with a map of Greenland thrown on a canvas from a stereopticon, one of the first correct geographical representations of that icy land perhaps ever made. With a long cane he traced the progress of the sailor's trousers from point to point, triumphantly establishing in the opinion of many learned men the theory of a current sweeping in a circular path through the arctic regions.

Professor Heilprin went on to tell of an expedition that will start from Norway, and followed as far as possible in the wake of the sailor's nether garments, the idea being that the waters will carry the ship almost without guidance clear to and around the north pole. The vessel is to be built with a view to an effectual resistance of the crushing effects of great ice masses. Another expedition will set out with the same objective point in view, but by a different route. The way pointed out by Parry in 1829, by way of the northeastern coast of Spitzbergen, will be traversed, and Professor Heilprin was inclined to think that Parry's views of the proper way to get to the north pole were sound.

The chief result of Peary's work—from a geographical standpoint—the lecturer declared, was the final settlement of Greenland's northern boundary. The territory has at last been proven to be an island. Its most northern expanse, moreover, is not covered with ice and snow. Politically it is a no man's land from a short distance above the seventy-third parallel clear to its topmost line. A race of arctic highlanders inhabits this independent region, and these people are believed to be the most northern tribe in point of location on the earth's surface and also the least numerous—233 souls in all. They are a most honest and attractive people.

Professor Heilprin defended the north pole expeditions from the attack made upon them by those who declare they are of no practical utility. Not only had they the romantic interest attaching to attempts to attain the mysteriously evanescent, but their benefits to science and general knowledge have been considerable. The Peary expedition had not for its object the reaching of the north pole, but the establishment of Greenland's northern boundary. Its results, in the language of an eminent man of science, dwarfed all other expeditions of the kind.

With reference to Greenland's interior the theory has existed, based upon the deductions of a Swedish explorer, that an oasis existed there. This oasis was declared to be entirely free from snow and ice, and to form what might be a habitable spot, with perhaps the characteristics of advanced human life. This theory, however, was but Alexander von Humboldt's theory restated, based upon observations of the altitudes of mountains. This theory, so far as the island of Greenland is concerned, is now found to be fallacious upon demonstration that cannot be questioned.

The experiences of whaling vessels, which during the last century penetrated far to the north beyond the known limits of the Arctic regions and found an open sea with very little trace of ice, were considered by Professor Heilprin. He considered the accounts quite accurate, contrary to the belief of many others, and thought that climate conditions may have changed in the frozen regions during the last 100 years.

The professor was inclined to think the discovery of the north pole but a comparatively few years off.—Philadelphia Press.

When Reptiles Ruled a World.

There was a time "in the wide revolving shades of centuries past" when our globe was wholly in the possession of walking, swimming and flying reptiles. Being the dominant type they divided naturally into three great classes. In the oceans they became gigantic paddling enaliosaurians; on dry land, or rather wet land (for the whole face of the globe was doubtless a quagmire at that time), they became monstrous, erect dinosaurians, some of which had legs fifteen feet or more in length; those which inhabited the regions of the air were the terrible flying pterodactyls.

For a vast but unknown length of time these awful creatures literally ruled the earth. Finally after they had "seen their day," they began to grow less and less. One by one they died out in the face of the younger and more vigorous fauna until at the present time only a few miniature alligators and crocodiles and a few toy snakes remain as reminders of skulking lizards and geckos and of the enormous reptilian types that once crowded land and sea.—St. Louis Republic.

COURTING BY COMMAND.

An Expedient That Restored to Three Daft Soldiers Their Senses.

In the spring and summer of 1862 the Maryland line was composed of a squadron of cavalry, a light battery and a battalion of infantry. It fought through Jackson's valley campaign and the Seven Days' battle, and was pretty badly frazzled out. So after the Seven Days' battle the colonel in command of the line was ordered to take his command to Charlottesville to recruit.

The command consisted of the elite of the youth of Maryland, nearly all the historic families of that state being represented among the commissioned officers and in the rank and file. It contained as bright and gay a set of young fellows as ever drew sabre or shouldered musket, and as a natural consequence the girls of Charlottesville had as jolly a time as though war had never existed. There were riding parties and dancing parties every day and night of the week. Of course the boys fell in love right and left, and there was no rest for horse or girl. The girls didn't mind it half as much as the horses.

Conspicuous among the beauties of the village was Miss Gay Bolling, a refugee from the Yankee lines, which then extended along the Rappahannock. Pope was at Culpeper, and there was just enough spice of danger and alertness to render romance doubly alluring. Miss Gay was a fearless rider and as bright as she was lovely. She was just eighteen, and her perfect figure and her grace of movement and manner would have made her a belle anywhere, so that with fifty young officers fresh from twenty battles and a hundred brave youths from the ranks, she had a gorgeous time.

Foremost among her admirers were Colonel Ridgely, of the cavalry, and Captain Booth, adjutant of the line, and Captain Williams, junior captain of infantry. They were not in love. They were simply daft. Handsome, brave and accomplished, they were just the lovers to set a girl crazy. Although they were rivals, they were nevertheless all devoted friends and as chivalrous to each other as they were devoted to their inamorata. They thought of nothing but flirting; they did nothing but flirt. Morning, noon and night orderlies (couriers they were called, and they were gentlemen at home, though private soldiers in the line) were kept busy riding their horses to death, bearing offerings of peaches, grapes and flowers to the shrine of Miss Gay from her adorers. Finally the patience of the colonel was exhausted; he could stand it no longer, and one day he summoned the three to his tent and said:

"Gentlemen, this command is going to blazes. All discipline is gone, and none of you are attending to your duty. Calico has set you crazy. Now, this thing has got to stop. Miss Gay can't marry you all. I doubt whether she wants either. So you've got to settle the matter at once. In love rank doesn't count, if it does in war. You are to draw straws and court Miss Gay before dress parade this evening. Get on your horses and proceed to business, and report to me after parade."

The young fellows looked rather scared. They would have charged a battery or rushed on a line of battle. They had often done so at the tap of drum or the sound of the bugle, but the idea of attacking this ravishing, entrancing bit of divinity and calico at a moment's notice under orders was appalling. However, they knew the colonel's word was law, so they drew straws. Captain Booth got the longest, and had first chance according to orders, so off he went. The others followed at a safe distance. After a short time Captain Booth came storming back to camp without saying a word. This encouraged the other two, and Captain Williams spurred ahead very gallantly. But before Colonel Ridgely had ridden a mile, back came the captain. "Go in, colonel," he cried as he rode past; "the ranks are shaking, but the line's firm."

This was discouraging, but the colonel walked bravely up and got his congé like his predecessors.

Three attacks in sixty minutes, and Gay routed the attacking columns, horse, foot and artillery.

She never knew she had been courted by command, and is now a handsome matron with eleven children.

I told her about it the other day. Gallant Ridgely was killed at the South Anna on Grant's advance to the James.

The other two are solid, middle aged gentlemen, with wives and children.—Minneapolis Tribune.

A Disappointed Crowd.

A slip of girl walked along the street pushing a bicycle by her side.

A man with a broad, intellectual head and the stamp of enterprise upon his every feature passed in the opposite direction. He was obviously in a hurry. The perspiration stood in beads upon his brow. The slip of a girl caught his eye.

"Aha!" he exclaimed.

Anxiously he consulted his watch.

"I haven't the time," he muttered, "but I must."

Turning quickly he retraced his steps.

With measured tread a thoughtful party with clerical garments sauntered on the shady side of the thoroughfare. He met the slip of a girl. He paused irresolutely.

"I ought not," he murmured, "but I must."

Presently he might have been observed sauntering in the other direction.

An ordinary individual, who was running for the doctor, forgot his errand of mercy and joined the procession which was following the slip of a girl pushing a bicycle by her side.

A postman with a special delivery letter, three sewer diggers, a dry goods merchant and a street car conductor were among the others who dropped ordinary vocations to join the popular movement.

The slip of a girl proceeded two blocks.

"Curse it."

The man with the broad, intellectual head looked mad; the thoughtful party, hurt; the ordinary individual, disgusted; the postman, the sewer diggers, the merchant and the conductor severally disappointed. They all sighed and went their ways.

The slip of a girl had chained her bicycle to a hitching post and disappeared in the house.

She did not even attempt to mount the machine.—Detroit Tribune.

Boulanger's Page.

Those who came into contact with the late General Boulanger will remember his perky little page Joseph, and his astonishing repartees. He used to order visitors about with an insolence above his tender years, and accepted every form of homage as a matter of course, holding his head erect while prominent visitors stood with their hats off and bowing to the little imp. Visitors knew that to win his favor was almost winning that of his master, and groveled before him. This sort of life incapacitated Joseph for any domestic service after the general's death. He has now given up town life and has returned to live with his mother at Etamps. Joseph, who is now sixteen, remembers his connection with General Boulanger as a vision of glory already fading in the distance.

TRAINED SEALS.

Captain Westton Tells About His Three Trained Performers.

THEY LIVE UPON SALT WATER FISH.

How He and a Famous German Fisherman Captured Bobby, Bibby and Tommy. Some of Their Clever Tricks.

Of all the different animals that go to make up the animal kingdom a fish is perhaps the strangest that should be chosen for training, yet the acts done by the three seals under Captain Weston's guidance show that even a fish can do wonderful things. Those now performing every day are the oldest seals in captivity. Seals are extremely delicate, and they rarely live away from their native sea and rocks for more than a year, and yet these seals, Bobby, Bibby and Tommy, have been performing regularly for six years. Their longevity is undoubtedly due to the fact that they receive great care.

The exact spot of the birthplace of these seals is not known, but when they were youngsters they were found on one of the islands off Coxshaven in Germany. The German government does all it can to protect its fisheries, and as seals are a constant menace to fish the government pays a reward of 5 marks for the capture of each seal. There is a famous seal fisherman in Germany named Worthman, and when Captain Weston, who had been on many sealing and whaling expeditions in the North sea, determined that he would give up the life of a sailor and become a landlubber it occurred to him that the training of seals would be novel and profitable. He went to Worthman, and together they captured the three sleek little fellows. There are many islands outside of Coxshaven, and one of the smallest was chosen. In describing the capture Captain Weston said:

We stretched the net on one side of one of the smaller islands and then went to the others and shot off pistols and made a noise, driving many seals into the water and against the net. We had to work very quickly, because the seals dived down and became entangled in the net, and a seal will drown if kept five minutes under water. When we finally pulled them up, we found that we had about 20 seals, but when they found themselves altogether they became enraged and fought among themselves, biting, scratching and tearing, even killing one another, until there were only three left, and these three are the same three I have today.

One has only a faint idea of the amount of patience which it requires to teach a fish, for such a seal really is. It looks easy to see one of my seals play the banjo or a harp, but it took me three months of hard work every day to teach them to do this even in an imperfect manner, and the only reason that I can give is that they have been at it long enough to learn.

I have never before known a seal to live in captivity over one year, and yet I have had mine many times that. I am often surprised at their intelligence. Especially is this true of Bobby, the clown. I believe that that fish understands humor, because he does things at times which actually make me laugh, to say nothing about the audience. He is the best seal I ever had, the best I ever will have, and I think that he has an affection for me, and that he knows almost everything that I say to him.

Yes, the care of seals is a great one. I keep them in a tank, and above the water is a shelf for them to lie on when they feel so inclined. This water is changed three times a day, and 20 pounds of salt are put into the water at each change, for a seal cannot live in fresh water, you know. They are as plump and fat today as they were lying on their native rocks in the North sea, and they know a great deal more about the world than they otherwise would have known. It may surprise some people, but it is nevertheless a fact, that these three seals eat 500 pounds of fish a week. They will only eat seafish, such as herring or flounder, and I attribute their long life to the fact that I am very careful with their food. The fish are washed and cleaned and the heads cut off just as carefully and just as cleanly as though going on a hotel table. The seal does not chew a fish, but swallows it whole, and it would surprise you to see how a great mass of fish will disappear when three seals get at it. All the accomplishments of these seals are not shown. They have been taught water tricks. I can throw a 10 cent piece into a tank of water, and, small as the piece is and flat as it lies on the bottom, at a word of command any one of my seals will dive for it and get it. This I do not show in public, because the tank is an unwieldy thing to keep about.

Have they ever bitten me? Yes, several times, and the seal's bite is a nasty one. The last time was when I placed the tambourine in front of Bibby. Without warning he grabbed me by the arm, and I certainly thought he would take a big piece out of it before I could make him let go, and I was obliged to strike him very severely before I could get him to let loose. My seals to me are great pets, and I think as much of them as I would of a child, for their great, big, intelligent eyes look up into mine with an expression which tells me if they only knew how they would certainly talk to me.—New York Tribune.

Cruikshank's "Fagin."

There is an interesting story, very little known, of how Cruikshank conceived his picture of Fagin, the Jew. During the time he was illustrating "Oliver Twist" he spent days traversing the east end of London in search of a face that would correspond with his conception of the character. One day while standing before a mirror in his dining room "pulling faces at himself," so to speak, for the want of something better to do, he accidentally made the features for which he was looking. The picture therefore of Fagin is really that of Cruikshank himself.—Yankee Blade.

The Southern Pacific Railroad Company never keeps faith with anybody, as everybody knows and its shabby treatment of the engineers who stood by it in the late strike will therefore cause little surprise.

The first thing that Ambassador Breckinridge will have to do when he gets to St Petersburg will be to make his identity perfectly clear to the czar and convince the autocrat of all the Russians that he is not the man against whom a scoolgirl named Pollard received $15,000 damages for breach of promise of marriage.

Michel Gambetta, wha died at Nice the other day, aged ninety years, was the uncle of the great French statesman. It is said that the cruel fate of Carnot, of whom the old man was a great admirer, had a good deal to do with hastening his death. According to the most accurate authorities, the name of Gambetta has become extinct with the death of Michel There will be but one Gambetta in the world's history.

A great many people think that the recent railroad strike was the most momentous demonstration of organized labor in the history of the country, but they have forgotten, or never knew, the magnitude of the great strike of 1877 when ten millions of property were destroyed in Pittsburg alone and the army was called out in greater numbers than during the recent unpleasantness. The trouble was felt in the railroads here to a greater extent this year than then; but taken altogether the matter was not so serious as was the great uprising of seventeen years ago.

There is no question that should the Democratic State Convention nominate Jackson Temple for Governor he would accept the nomination; and there is scarcely a doubt that he would be elected. He is known as a man who is fearless and intelligent in declaring and upholding the law; and in a government of the people; by the people and for the people that is the kind of man that is needed at the head of affairs. Judge Temple would have the laws enforced against corporations with the same vigor and impartiality that he would against natural persons; and there would be no anarchy in this State with him in the executive office.

It was hardly needed that Japan should have formerly declared war against China She had done that already in actions louder and more potent than words. Yet the formality has been observed, and the nations will take note. So far Japan has shown that in naval warfare she is greatly superior to China. When it comes to operations by land she has yet to signalize her superiority over the Chinese. Doubtless the latter can place greater armies in the field; but whether they will prove as efficient soldiers has yet to be determined. The Japanese will perhaps make up for paucity of numbers in the intelligence of discipline and superiority of military conduct and art.

The fact that the house conferees on the tariff bill have begun to show a firmness that gives no sign of yielding to the bulldozing of the senate has had the effect of causing the senate conferees to lower their tone But the whole country is suffering so seriously from the protracted suspense in this matter of tariff legislation that the highest statesmanship now is that which will relieve the situation by the passage of the measure in the best shape possible with the least delay. Let the bill be passed; and then the house can introduce supplementary measures to correct the defects in the tariff and leave the onus with the senate to defeat them. It may be urged that it is to late in the session to raise any new issues on the tariff. The house, however. is largely enough Democratic to make quick work of the passage of a reformatory bill; and then the senate can show its hands even more plainly than it has already exhibited them to the country. But what everybody wants now is to see the deadlock broken and the country given a chance to know "where it is at."

FLOWER SUPERSTITIONS.

Maidens' Barometers For Divining the Depths of Their Sweethearts' Love.

It is singular to see how many meaningless ceremonies are now practiced by young women—ceremonies which were formerly used in earnest as love charms or incantations. Most of these have an amatory origin, and in connection with not a few certain flowers are used, presumably as a means of foretelling the future. In several parts of New England when a young lady expects a visit from her lover she will pluck a marigold, take it in her hand when he arrives and carry it until the end of his visit, when from its fresh or faded condition she will judge of the strength of his affection.
